Mr. BARTLETT. I have no desire for the further continuation of the reading, and especially as it casts a burden upon the clerks who have to read it. It is an important bill, and I have never concealed my purpose in calling for the reading. I will say that I did not know that this bill was on the calendar until last Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. It was not on the calendar until Wednesday.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am opposed to some legislation that is on the calendar for consideration. I did not want to consider it last Wednesday, and I do not want it considered at all if I can prevent it. I think I am justified in exercising every reasonable and proper method to defeat it, and without concurrence with the gentleman from Louisiana or without his knowledge or without any knowledge that the bill was on the calendar, I took advantage of the situation. Now, as far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to burden the reading clerks, nor do I wish to take up the attention of the House in reading the bill, and I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to dispensing with the further first reading of the bill?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, if it is proper for me to answer the question of the gentleman from Georgia as to whether or not if the further reading of the bill is dispensed with we will proceed with its further consideration, I am not prepared to answer it until I know the reasons that the gentleman from Illinois has for the postponement or against the consideration of the bill. I do not know what he is going to offer against the consideration. If I knew where he places his objection then I would be prepared to answer the gentleman from Georgia. Until I know the basis I can not answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Illinois for unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois can not raise the question of consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois can not raise the question of consideration in committee. Does the gentleman from Virginia want to be heard?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, it is a very plain proposition that you can not raise it, because the consideration can only be raised in the House. The House has considered the bill and gone into Committee of the Whole on it. If you can raise the question of consideration in Committee of the Whole on a bill which the House has already agreed to consider, then that gives the Committee of the Whole greater powers than the House has.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] is correct on this proposition. As I remember, it is claimed that there was a ruling by Speaker Cannon on the subject, but I have not been able to find it. The House, Mr. Chairman, can refuse to consider any proposition before it, even though it be of the highest privilege, like an election case. But the question of consideration can not be raised in the House when a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill. If the Chair will examine the Manual, section 763, he will find that it is analogous to the rule I intend to invoke, where it says, in effect, that when a proposition is made to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and some one raises the question of consideration on the bill, the rulings have been uniform that that question of consideration can not be entertained for the reason that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when voted upon is itself a determination of the House to consider or not consider the bill. The rulings upon that question, Mr. Chairman, will be found in volume 5, Hinds' Precedents, section 4973, 4974, 4975, 4976.

One of the instances I recall was when I raised the question of consideration upon the banking and currency bill and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Dalzell, was in the chair. He would not entertain the question whether the House would consider it, but put the question whether the House would go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. His opinion will be found in section 4976 of Hinds' Precedents. A number of instances will be found, one where Mr. Bland made a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the silver coinage bill, and Mr. Hendricks, of New York, raised the question of consideration. Speaker Crisp ruled that the question of consideration was not one to be taken up by the House when it could be solved by the simple vote on a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, because the one dispensed with the other, and both amounted to the same thing. If the House votes to go into Committee of the Whole House, that is a vote to consider the bill. If it votes not to go into the Committee of the Whole House, it votes not to consider the bill. I take it there can be no question about that.

Now, the bill having gotten into Committee of the Whole, the question of consideration can not be raised in Committee of the Whole by analogy for the same reason that it could not be considered in the House upon a motion to go into Committee of the Whole. Why? The House can refuse to consider the bill by simply agreeing to a motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House for disposition or, if the bill has not been completed, that the committee do simply rise. If we decide that in the affirmative by voting it up, we do not consider the bill any further, except by direction of the House. If we vote it down, the House then determines to go on and consider the bill, so that the rules and the precedents upon the rules are analogous.

But we are here upon a Calendar Wednesday, Mr. Chairman. Calendar Wednesday was obtained for the special purpose of considering bills; and because we have bound ourselves to consider bills on Calendar Wednesday, and because we say that when a bill is reached which is required to be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or in the Committee of the Whole, therefore we have put ourselves in the position where we can not raise the question of consideration. We have done it with our eyes open. Calendar Wednesday was insisted upon, advocated, clamored for, in order to dispose of the business on the calendar, and because no other means could be secured, and we hedged it around by certain restrictions and certain privileges, so as to make it almost sacred, and I believed it is called sacred Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Holy Wednesday.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; holy Wednesday. Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee can rise if it votes to do so, or if it wishes to continue the consideration of this bill it can vote down the motion that the committee do now rise, and that is a decision of the question whether the committee will consider the bill or go further with it. I do not know of any rule or precedent other than the decision of Speaker Cannon which authorizes the raising of the question of consideration against a bill in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Most assuredly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman understand that there is any time at which the question of consideration can be raised on Calendar Wednesday in a case like this; and if so, when?

Mr. BARTLETT. If that is the rule, we made it; and we might as well stand by it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman think the question of consideration can be raised in the House before the House automatically goes into the committee?

Mr. BARTLETT. I doubt very much whether it can. I would not like to give the Chair a definite opinion on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the impression that a majority ought to be able to determine in some way whether they will take up a bill or not, either in the House or in committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly this House could by a two-thirds vote dispense with the consideration of this bill on Calendar Wednesday, and the rules have provided for dispensing with Calendar Wednesday. I do not mean that you could dispense with a particular bill. But I say the House is not powerless to refuse to consider a bill on Calendar Wednesday. The House, by the vote prescribed in the rule, a two-thirds vote, can dispense with Calendar Wednesday and so dispense with the consideration of this bill. If this bill is going to take up all day and the House does not want to consider it, it can, by the proper vote, dispense with it. So the House has only fixed a different rule as to how we shall refuse to consider bills on Calendar Wednesday. It has fixed a different majority. If we are not satisfied with the rule we have adopted in reference to Calendar Wednesday, let us change the rule. We made the rule for the purpose of considering bills. So far as I am concerned I do not see any difference between the proposition to vote down a motion to go into Committee of the Whole, which is a determination of the question of consideration, and voting in Committee of the Whole that the committee rise and report progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman a question there: If the motion is made now that the committee rise and go back into the House, and that motion is carried, then, as soon as we go back into the House, are we not in exactly the same place where we started, and does not the House automatically go back into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BARTLETT. If that is the rule, I do not undertake to decide that. That has been the practice. I understand that what the Chair means is that the House having automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on Calendar Wednesday, if the motion should be carried that the committee rise and report to the House that it had come to no resolution on the bill, then, unless there was some method by which the bill could lose its place on the calendar, by unanimous consent or in some other method, the House would automatically go back into Committee of the Whole and continue the consideration of the bill. Suppose that is the condition. We have made it by this rule, and it seems better to follow a bad rule than to make one without authority of the House. That is my position.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7138. An act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, numbered 24, 113, 121, 123, 137, 161, and 164, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. DU PONT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. PAGE and Mr. LANE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of the Interior.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

LAWS RELATING TO THE JUDICIARY.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I have a single suggestion that I want to make to the Chairman before he rules. One week ago the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] was in the chair as Speaker pro tempore, and the point of order was made against the question of consideration raised on this bill in the House, and he ruled that the question of consideration could not be raised in the House on Calendar Wednesday. Now we are in Committee of the Whole, and the question of consideration is raised, and the point of order is made against it. I want to call the attention of the Chairman to the rule of consideration. It is found in Rule XVI, clause 3, and it says:

When any motion or proposition is made the question "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put unless demanded by a Member.

That is, the question is not "Will the Committee of the Whole now consider the bill?" but "Will the House now consider the bill?"

I know the embarrassment of the Chair in regard to Calendar Wednesday, and the fact that the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union would seem to preclude the question of consideration in the House; but the same rule which provides for Calendar Wednesday provides that a two-thirds majority of the House may dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

Now, if it is not in order to raise the question of consideration in the House on Calendar Wednesday, how would it be possible to get a vote of two-thirds of the Members in the House to dispense with Calendar Wednesday? It seems to me there must be within the bounds of the Speaker's right to rule power to give the House opportunity to act in the consideration of all matters in order on Calendar Wednesday. However, the idea I want to convey to the Chair is this, that if he follows the ruling of Speaker Cannon that in the Committee of the Whole on Calendar Wednesday it is possible to raise the question of consideration, we deprive the House of the opportunity to have a roll call on the question of consideration. We have the opportunity for a roll call in the House, but not in the committee. If, then, it is in order to raise the question of consideration in the House, we can put the House on record in these matters. If the ruling of the Chair to-day is that of Speaker Cannon, that the question of consideration is in order in the Committee of the Whole, we can not have a roll call, and I think that is of moment for the Chair to have this in mind before he rules.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the point just made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that the form of the question is, "Will the House now consider the bill?" emphasizing the word "House," is not tenable at all, because the rules provide that the rules of procedure in the House shall be observed in Committees of the Whole, so far as they may be applicable. The form being stated, "Will the House now consider the bill?" does not make any difference. The question is whether this rule in reference to consideration is applicable in Committee of the Whole.

Let us see what the situation is.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman goes into that next heading, will he yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. If what the gentleman says is true about the House and the Committee of the Whole being identical, so far as the rules are concerned——

Mr. MANN. But I did not say that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did not the gentleman virtually say that?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. MURDOCK. That the rules of the House applied to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MANN. So far as they are applicable. We do not have a roll call in Committee of the Whole, and we can not have a motion to recommit in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MURDOCK. And we can not adjourn.

Mr. MANN. We can not adjourn in Committee of the Whole. There are a number of things that we can not do in Committee of the Whole; but so far as the form of the question is concerned, using the word "House," that does not, in my judgment, amount to anything, because if the rule is applicable at all, it is applicable in Committee of the Whole, and the form would be, "Will the committee now consider the bill?"

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not speaking now with reference to Calendar Wednesday; but would not the voting down of the motion that the committee do now rise be a determination ordinarily without reference to Calendar Wednesday that the committee desired to consider the bill?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly. What is the situation? Ordinarily you can not raise the question of consideration in Committee of the Whole, either in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or in Committee of the Whole which is considering Private Calendar bills. You can not raise it on the Private Calendar, because a motion is in order to take up one bill as against another bill, and the committee has control of the question. If it has more than two bills on the calendar, it can take up whichever it desires on motion, and if it has only one it can rise if it does not want to consider it. Ordinarily the motion is not applicable in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, because ordinarily you do not get into that committee at all except by motion, and the rulings have been practically consistent that having the right to vote down the motion, if the House votes the motion through, you can not raise the identical question as soon as you get into the committee, because that would be a waste of time.

If this bill had been a House bill, called up by the gentleman from Louisiana, you could raise the question of consideration upon it in the House at once. The rules do not contemplate that a Union Calendar bill has any greater rights on Calendar Wednesday than a House bill. Ordinarily on a call of committees you could not consider a Union Calendar bill at all. This is a Union Calendar bill. Under the old rules it would not have been taken up on a call of committees, but when Calendar Wednesday was established there was authority given on the call of committees, in addition to considering House bills, to consider Union Calendar bills by merely calling them up. If it were a House bill, you could raise the question of consideration and decline to consider the bill, but it is a Union Calendar bill.

When that rule was established there was nothing said in the rule as to whether it required a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or whether that would be done by declaration of the Speaker resolving the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and calling a Chairman to the chair. I shall not undertake to say which would be the proper procedure. Personally I was inclined to think, in the first place, that the proper thing to do was to have a motion to that effect, but such a motion might be used for filibustering purposes on a roll call, and the Speaker, Mr. Cannon, held that under the rules the House would automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without a motion. You could not, therefore, defeat a motion and refuse to go into Committee of the Whole. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole. This very question, as I recall it—and I have not read the proceedings in reference to it, and I do not speak with accuracy—was raised at the time before the Speaker made his ruling. What would be the effect, if you have an automatic resolving of the House into Committee of the Whole, on the question of consideration? You can not vote down a motion, because none is made; and is the House to be left in a position where it can not refuse to consider a bill? The Speaker, as I recall, at that time declared that that was something which could be done in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman? I understood such a decision had been made, but I have not been able to find it.

Mr. MANN. I know that such a decision was made.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. If the Chair should hold that it is in order to raise the question of consideration in the committee, and the question was raised, and the committee refused to consider the bill, then the only thing for the committee to do would be to rise.

Mr. MANN. I think so.

Mr. HAY. Suppose the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS], chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, upon which the call of committees rests, were again to call up this same bill, how could we prevent the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the same bill?

Mr. MANN. I do not think he could call up the same bill again.

Mr. HAY. Why not?

Mr. MANN. For the same reason that when the House raises a question of consideration on a House bill and the House declines to consider it, and the gentleman's committee still has the call, he can not again call up that bill.

Mr. HAY. I understand that; but that is in the House and this is in the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. HAY. When we get back into the House the action of the committee surely will not control the House.

Mr. MANN. I think it will control the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is something I wanted to suggest to the gentleman—whether the House would have such knowledge of the action of the committee as to warrant it in refusing recognition to a Member to go back into committee for the consideration of the same bill.

Mr. MANN. I will not undertake to cross that bridge. I do not undertake to say that the House could not reject the action of the committee. That is another proposition; but unless the House rejects the action of the committee by a direct vote in the House, then I think the House is bound by the action of the committee.

Mr. SHERLEY. How could the House pass upon it if, under the rule, you automatically go back into the committee upon motion being made and if the motion be in order? The trouble is the House has gotten itself into the condition by a wrong ruling in the first place.

Mr. MANN. I think not. If the committee refuses to consider the bill and reports it back to the House, I am not sure a motion would not be in order then to consider the bill; but in the absence of such a motion being made in the House and carried in the House, I do not think the same bill could be called up again because the committee has reported to the House that the committee had declined to consider the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the whole trouble was in ever proceeding on the theory that a question of consideration could not be raised before going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in the first instance on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. But the only way you can do that is by motion, and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. ALEXANDER] has ruled on this bill that you could not raise the question of consideration in the House. Now, let us see where we would leave ourselves. If you say that you can not raise the question of consideration in the House, and you can not as long as you have an automatic resolving of the House into the Committee of the Whole, and if you add to that that you can not raise the question of consideration in the committee——

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman could not raise the question in the House upon any bill, regardless of Calendar Wednesday, where a motion was made to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider it, could he?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has stated that, and so have I, and so has everybody else, I guess. There is no controversy about that. That has been stated here before. Now, see where we would leave ourselves. Here is a bill, taking an actual case, 198 pages long, with several hundred amendments to it. Everybody knows if anyone wanted to filibuster, or particularly if a minority wanted a filibuster on a bill of this kind, it would be impossible on Calendar Wednesdays to finish it in months. It could not be finished at this session of Congress if this session should extend to September or October. Now, can it be possible that it will be held by Members of the House that the committee shall be left in the position where it must proceed with the consideration of a bill which it does wish to consider, and which a minority of the House wants to use solely for the purpose, I will assume—not in this case, but in another case—for the purpose of preventing other bills from coming before the House? That would be to kill Calendar Wednesday just as dead as though it were not in existence.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that anybody should undertake to delay consideration of this bill as is being done. If we had gone ahead with a reasonable consideration of the bill on last Calendar Wednesday, and were now at work under the five-minute rule, as we might be, and as we ought to be, this bill should be finished within a reasonable time. This is one of the most important bills that will be before this House. There are no politics in it of any kind, there is no reason why anybody should oppose its consideration, and apparently the only reason that anybody opposes the consideration of this bill at this time is because they do not wish some other bill to be considered, and the longer we delay in having these preliminary discussions about consideration and about the rules the longer it will take to consider this bill finally. If we were at work right now, as we ought to be, under the five-minute rule, we would soon get through with this bill, notwithstanding it is 198 pages long, because the probabilities are the Clerk would read along page after page and there would be but few amendments.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall the two codification bills we passed, the criminal code and the judicial title?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall how long we were considering those?

Mr. LLOYD. On those two bills I think we were nearly two weeks.

Mr. MANN. Nearly two weeks; we were more than two months, and never finished either one.

Mr. LLOYD. I am not sure about the time, but my recollection is it was not more than two weeks—that is, 12 days.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says 2 weeks and then 12 days. Two weeks and 12 days are different, but we never finished either one of them in committee.

Mr. BRYAN. Twelve days of Calendar Wednesdays would be three months, so it would take all summer.

Mr. LLOYD. This bill can not take that long. There is nothing in this bill except the judiciary——

Mr. MANN. There was nothing in the criminal code except the codification and nothing in the judicial title except——

Mr. LLOYD. Nothing in the criminal code except everything affecting criminality connected with the statutes of the United States. Here is nothing except the judiciary and its method of procedure.

Mr. MANN. The judicial title covered that. That was a codification of the laws we had passed in relation to the courts. That was one we had up here for weeks and weeks, and the question of consideration was threatened to be raised several times. Mr. Moon of Pennsylvania asked and beseeched each time, hoping that he would get along, but he never finished the bill in the House——

Mr. LLOYD. The chairman of the committee informs me we considered the judicial code for four Wednesdays.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. We considered it more than any four Wednesdays.

Mr. SHERLEY. I was a member of the joint committee that put both of those laws on the statute books. I have no objection to the consideration of this bill, but in my judgment it is impossible to ever get a codification bill through if it is not considered by the House and Senate practically at the same time in the two years of a Congress.

That was the history of this House four or five years, and because it was the history the House and the Senate created a joint committee that worked together in reporting such bills. These bills were reported in the House and in the Senate at the same time, and practically taken up and considered in the House and the Senate at the same time, so as to leave only a question of conference between the two bodies, because prior to that we had found that the delay in passing any one of the bills through one body was so great as to bring it at a time not only in the life of the session, but in the life of a Congress, as to make it impracticable to pass it in the other House and put it on the statute books.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not see as that makes any particular difference, because you have to take the time to consider it in the House and in the Senate, and whether they consider it concurrently or not is a different proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; it is not, and for this reason: The Senate will never get hold of this bill until after it has passed through the House. Then it is necessary for the Senate Committee on Revision, if that committee does its work at all well, to give it days and days of arduous work. I know this, because I, as a member of the committee, came here to work when Congress was not in session, and to do that work efficiently it means practically to exclude consideration of everything else by the man who is working on it. By the time the Judiciary Committee would be in a position to report the bill the House has passed, the Congress would be at an end.

Mr. LLOYD. That may be true as to this bill.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Kentucky will recall, and I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] as well, that both of the other codifications were passed by passing the Senate bill under suspension of the rules.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken, because I went into conference on the penal-code bill, and it became a law——

Mr. MANN. I will tell the gentleman how it happened. After we had considered this codification bill on Calendar Wednesday in the Committee of the Whole for a long time, toward the very close of the session the Senate bill came over here from the Senate. The motion to suspend the rules was made, I know, because I drew the motion to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the bill of the House, and then asked for a conference. That was the way it was passed.

Mr. SHERLEY. My memory is, but I will not be certain about it, that the penal-code bill was gotten up under a special order of the House—not on Calendar Wednesday at all—which made it a standing order, and it was considered from time to time and got both through the House and through the Senate. It then went into conference, and I recall there was quite a conflict as to the conference report, which had been practically agreed to in conference, when a certain Senator made the statement that he would not permit the bill to come up if one provision was not eliminated. We afterwards eliminated that provision in conference and then passed the bill a few hours before the adjournment of the Congress.

Mr. MANN. It was done by moving to suspend the rules, take the bill from the Speaker's table, strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the House bill. Then a conference was asked.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think that was practically after we finished the House bill.

Mr. MANN. It was before we finished it.

Mr. SHERLEY. But this is the point that I think this committee ought to understand: It is absolutely impossible, in my judgment—and I speak because, perhaps, I have had more experience than any present Member of this Congress touching codification—to ever get a bill properly before this House and then have it properly considered independently in the Senate and passed.

Now, the gentleman says this bill is a simple codification. If it is a simple codification, we are wasting our time, because it deals with a lot of matters that ought to be more than codified. The judicial code and the penal code were not only a codification, but were properly made new law.

Mr. LLOYD. There are changes in existing statutes provided for in this particular bill. I appreciate all that is said with reference to the difficulty of getting a bill like this through. I have had considerable experience with revision myself. A number of years ago we had a revision of the Alaskan Code. The law used to be that the laws of Oregon should be the laws of Alaska so far as they were applicable, and the revision committee—this particular committee—undertook to revise the law and to designate which laws were applicable and to make such amendments as were necessary to make the laws applicable—a very difficult task. Now, the consideration of that bill took some three weeks in the House. It included both the civil and criminal statutes.

Mr. MANN. That was all done at night sessions.

Mr. LLOYD. Not all of it. We did both. We had day sessions as well as night sessions.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman was mistaken.

Mr. LLOYD. Hon. Vespasian Warner was chairman of the committee, and I do not do anybody any harm when I say that he and I were responsible mainly for the work that was done at that time.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives and this Committee of the Whole would be placed in a ridiculous light before the country to say that after this bill has been under consideration in the Committee of the Whole for two Calendar Wednesdays, and until this late in the day, now we should not consider it because of the fact that the time when it should have been considered—that is, the question raised—should have been in the House of Representatives. In other words, Mr. Chairman, whether we go into consideration of this bill in the Committee of the Whole to determine that question in the Committee of the Whole, or whether we determine it in the House, is already a settled question. We are already considering the bill. We have already used hours and hours in its consideration. We have not voted on any proposition in the bill, it is true; but if it were an appropriation bill, which was large enough to take several hours or days to read, or any other measure that would take this length of time that has been taken by this bill, and it should be thought that it should be brought before the House, how would it be an economy of time, as argued by the gentlemen on the other side, to wait until the bill has been partially or nearly read in this House? How could it be an economy of time to stop in the midst of the proceedings and raise a question as to consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the Chair?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the question of consideration can not be raised until the bill has been read the first time, or the reading waived.

Mr. WATKINS. Then, if that is the case, Mr. Chairman, the proper procedure would be that the Committee of the Whole should not determine the question as to whether we shall consider the bill or not, but is a question that is left to the House, because the Committee of the Whole is under the province, jurisdiction, and control of the House of Representatives.

It is not a question for the Committee of the Whole to determine whether or not, on a bill which comes from the House of Representatives and as to which the House of Representatives has delegated the authority to the committee to proceed with the bill, to take away from the House of Representatives the right to control the management and order of its affairs—to take it out of the House and control it by the committee.

Mr. Chairman, if it is a fact that the Committee of the Whole could prevent the consideration of a bill, the House of Representatives would be deprived of the right to say what should be the course of its proceedings and how the proceedings in the House of Representatives should be controlled. This is strictly and purely a question for the House to consider, and not a question for the committee to consider.

It may be that the proper course to be pursued would be for this committee to rise for the purpose of submitting this question to the House of Representatives. It is not a fact that every time the committee rises we cease entirely the consideration of a bill which has been before the House. Many times when the committee rises and makes a report upon the progress of a measure before the House it is perfectly proper; but it is not proper for the House, under the rules, to prevent the subject from originally being considered. But if it is not possible to regulate the order of its consideration after the bill is read by the House, it is certainly the province of the House to control the order of its procedure.

Why, even in any parliamentary body where we may be proceeding, and where the rules are not specifically stated, we are governed by Jefferson's Manual. The rule is provided that in cases which are not covered specifically by the rules we should be governed by Jefferson's Manual. We know that in most meetings and conventions and assemblies and other bodies when committees are appointed those committees are expected to report back their proceedings to the body by which they were appointed.

The duty of proceeding with the consideration of this bill has been delegated by the House to the committee, and the only proper thing under the circumstances would be for the committee to rise and report to the House the fact that they were ready to proceed with the consideration of the bill and ask if it is the pleasure of the House for the consideration of the bill to be proceeded with.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, this is a very interesting question of order, but it seems to me that there are certain fundamental principles involved that forbid the conclusion that this motion can be made in Committee of the Whole. The rules very distinctly provide that the rules of the House shall be operative in the Committee of the Whole so far as they may be applicable to the conditions there prevailing. The extent of their use depends upon the precedents, and the construction of the Chairman, when dealing with novel situations.

Why is it that the question of consideration may not be raised in the House against this particular bill? The answer given is that the rule forbids it.

In effect this amounts to saying that a rule which forbids the question of consideration to be raised in the House operates to afford this right to a subordinate creation of the House. Such an interpretation presents a rather anomalous situation. We create a body of rules for the House and provide that these rules may be used in committee to the extent that they may be applicable. But this is the first time that the contention has been distinctly presented that a rule which forbids the exercise of a right to the Members of the House, operates ex necessitate rei to afford that right to the members of the Committee of the Whole. It strikes me that this is rather illogical.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question, so that he can enlighten the committee. Does the gentleman from Virginia believe that this question could properly have been raised in the House before it automatically resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Without going into the reason for the ruling, or giving my approval to the same, I understand that a ruling has been made to the effect that this particular bill, owing to the particular calendar from which it has come, is automatically taken into the Committee of the Whole, to the exclusion of a question of consideration in the House. But it does not follow therefore that the question of consideration can be raised in the Committee of the Whole. Merely because the rule, as interpreted, forbids a Member to raise the question of consideration in the House, affords no reason for the conclusion or deduction that it thereby affords authority to raise this question in a subsequent session of this committee. The right to raise the question of consideration is a right under the rules. Hence it is perfectly competent for the rules to provide that as to bills coming from a certain calendar the question of consideration shall not be raised at all, either in the House, or in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Then does the gentleman think that, under the rules as they are, that question can not be raised at all?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That seems to me to be the logical situation, having in mind the antecedent ruling with respect to bills from the Union Calendar.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me before he goes further?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. If what the gentleman says is true about the question of consideration, how would the gentleman from Virginia—and I have great respect for his parliamentary knowledge—dispense with the Calendar Wednesday? What would be the proceeding?

Mr. SAUNDERS. By a motion to that effect.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is provided for in the rules of the House?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. But it is no more in the rules of the House than is this question of consideration.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly not.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then why does the gentleman contend that that question can not be raised?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have stated that having in mind an antecedent decision which stands unreversed it is conceded that this question could not be raised in the House as to this bill; but I have stated further that because the rule so interpreted, deprives the Members of the House of a right, it does not follow that the same rule affords this right to the members of the Committee of the Whole. Hence there is no ground for believing that this right exists in the Committee of the Whole. I do not agree with the propriety of the original ruling, but that decision is not necessarily in issue. Admitting its authority, of the decision, it does not carry with it the conclusion drawn by the gentleman from Illinois.

I wish to call the attention of the Chairman to another matter in this connection, and that is that the House is not helpless in respect to the consideration of this or any bill. The same rule that allows the House to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, may be invoked to dispense with the consideration of some particular bill on Calendar Wednesday.

The CHAIRMAN. By a two-thirds vote?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; by a two-thirds vote, so that the House, and not the Committee of the Whole is vested with full authority to determine whether it will, or will not, consider this bill, or any other bill from the Union Calendar. When we get back into the House under the familiar motion to rise, then the appropriate motion may be made in this connection by any Member. If he wishes to displace this bill, he need only make the motion to dispense with the same, and if the necessary votes are forthcoming, the bill will be displaced.

This motion will raise the question of consideration and the mere fact that a two-thirds vote will be required, need not concern the House, nor the Chair, for we are interpreting, not making rules. This is merely a question of what the law is; and if the rule chooses to provide—and it appears to have so provided, as a result of the decision to which I have referred—that so far as this particular bill is concerned, the question of consideration must be sustained by a two-thirds vote, we need not concern ourselves with the conclusion, if it is fairly deduced from the rule. We are not here to make rules. We are concerned to provide a body of precedents that will make the rules coherent and effective.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia construe this rule to mean that we could dispense with a single bill on the calendar?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Undoubtedly. Why not? There is nothing in the rule that militates against that view.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is as follows:

On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4 of this rule, unless the House, by a two-thirds vote, on motion to dispense therewith, shall otherwise determine.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In other words, to dispense with Calendar Wednesday, or some particular business which at that time is before the House. Now why is that an unreasonable interpretation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not certain but that that rule applies to the entire day.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I admit that it does apply to the entire day, and if it does apply to the entire day, then in conformity with a very familiar illustration, what is broad enough to apply to and include the whole may be construed to apply to something that is included in and therefore less than the whole. The business that may be transacted on Calendar Wednesday is less than the day itself, and if this House is competent to set aside so solemn a thing as holy Wednesday, by a two-thirds vote, then it is a simple conclusion, it seems to me, that that same House is clothed by virtue of that authority with the power to displace some particular bill business that two-thirds of the House is indisposed to consider.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman's argument lead to the conclusion that if Calendar Wednesday was dispensed with to meet the present case, the pending bill would then take its place on the calendar on the succeeding Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. SAUNDERS. There has been so much refinement in the rulings in connection with Calendar Wednesday, that I do not desire to go a bit further, and undertake to make anticipatory rulings. I wish to plant myself squarely on solid ground in this connection, and am trying to point out that as it is admitted that we can dispense with the whole day by a two-thirds vote, the same rule which affords this authority will enable us to get rid of any encumbering legislation that we do not care to consider.

Mr. MADDEN. Would that dispose of the legislation entirely for the session of Congress?

Mr. SAUNDERS. We can dispose of the whole day. Therefore we can dispose of a fragment of the business, and thereby reach that business in which the House is more immediately interested.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman admits, I think, that on Calendar Wednesday the question of consideration could be raised in the House against a bill that is on the House Calendar.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the House by a majority vote could determine not to consider it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, even admitting that the gentleman is right, that you can dispose of a part of the calendar, should there be any distinction in requiring a two-thirds vote to determine not to consider a bill on the Union Calendar and a majority vote for a bill on the House Calendar?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, your honor—and in view of your title I may very properly address the present Chairman as "your honor"—in the interpretation of a law it sometimes becomes necessary to make distinctions that probably were not in the mind of the lawmakers at the time the law was enacted. Having found ourselves in this connection unable to raise and determine the question of consideration by a majority vote, the rule as interpreted, forbidding it, but still wishing to find somewhere in the rule the right given to raise the question of consideration, we find it in the right to dispense with the consideration of any bill from the Union Calendar by a two-thirds vote. Thus interpreted the rule preserves the right to continue Calendar Wednesday, and at the same time by a two-thirds vote reject consideration of an undesirable bill. Thus Calendar Wednesday will be preserved, and business will go forward. At the same time we will escape the anomalous situation of depriving the House of the right of consideration, and giving it to a committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds this reference here:

No preference to bills on the House Calendar over bills on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, if the gentleman is correct in his reasoning, you could raise the question of consideration and defeat the consideration of a bill on the House Calendar by a majority vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But you could not defeat the consideration of a bill on the Union Calendar except by a two-thirds vote, and there would be a discrimination.

Mr. SAUNDERS. But observe that we are driven to that conclusion by reason of the fact that a distinction has been created by the antecedent ruling to which reference has been made. It is this ruling that has made the original distinction. I am not making the distinction. The ruling heretofore made that the question of consideration can not be raised against bills coming from the Union Calendar, but that the House must automatically go into the Committee of the Whole, is the cause of our present predicament. That decision has made a distinction between the two classes of bills. One may be voted down by a majority vote, the other is automatically taken into the Committee of the Whole. This basic decision compels the conclusion that the question of consideration may not be raised at all against bills coming from the Union Calendar, save by the motion to dispense with the offending bill. I am not attacking that ruling at present. It is not necessary to do so; but the decision having made the distinction, I am trying to go forward in a logical way, to the conclusions that flow therefrom, and derive the necessary authority from the rule to preserve some particular Calendar Wednesday, and at the same time enable the House to displace some objectionable bill.

In this connection I do not think you ought to lose sight of the fact that the Chair is making another distinction should it hold that the question of consideration can be raised in Committee of the Whole. Such a conclusion is contrary to the fundamental relationship between the Committee of the Whole, and the House, the creator, and the thing created. It is in contravention of the antecedent practice of this House, to clothe the Committee of the Whole, with any such power. Such a ruling will give the Committee of the Whole, with respect to bills coming from the Union Calendar, a power which it does not enjoy with respect to other bills that are committed to its consideration.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. What is the distinction that the gentleman makes in the effect that would result? You raise the question of consideration. You take a vote, and in that way you dispense with the bill if you do not wish to consider it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. But instead of that you say we may make a different motion, which would have the same effect. That motion would be to dispense with the consideration of this particular bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The difference is that one requires a majority vote, and the other a two-thirds vote, that is all.

Mr. LLOYD. But the effect of it is exactly the same.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The effect is the same. We all agree to that. The difference is in the route by which you arrive at your result.

Mr. LLOYD. What I am getting at is this: If you can not do the one, how can you do the other?

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is no difficulty whatever in that query. The rules expressly provide that you can do the one, and we are limited as to the other by the effect of the ruling that I have cited.

Mr. LLOYD. I do not think the rule specifically provides for it. You may by deduction reach the conclusion, but the rule itself has no provision.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman might make that criticism with respect to the interpretation of any rule. I say the rule provides for this motion because in plain language it says that with respect to business that is before the House it shall be carried on, unless by a two-thirds vote on a motion to dispense therewith, the House shall otherwise determine. The rule says that, and to say that this language applies only to Calendar Wednesday is giving a narrow and unreasonable effect to the language used. In other words you claim that these broad terms, allow us to dispense with the whole day, by a two-thirds vote but forbid us by a like vote from removing from consideration a single piece of legislation proper to be considered on that day.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The question of consideration requires a majority vote?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. To dispense with Calendar Wednesday would require a two-thirds vote, would it not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Then if you can raise the question of consideration in Committee of the Whole, which I do not think we can, is not that equivalent to suspending the rules and Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the logical deduction from allowing this question to be raised in the Committee of the Whole, and therefore the illustration furnishes an additional reason why the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. FESS. The consideration of the question requires but a majority vote in the House, and if it was made in the committee it should require a two-thirds vote since it works a change of the rules.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know that I exactly catch the full meaning of the gentleman's question.

Mr. FESS. If we could raise the question of consideration in Committee of the Whole and the committee negatively acted upon it, it would operate to suspend the rules for Calendar Wednesday which had required the House automatically to go into Committee of the Whole. Thereby would we not have a rule for a question of consideration to be determined at one time by a majority and at another time by two-thirds vote?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand the gentleman's proposition and will amplify it a little. The gentleman contends that as the rule provides that this bill shall be automatically considered in Committee of the Whole, we are considering it in Committee of the Whole by virtue of the rule. Hence if the Committee of the Whole is now allowed to dispense with consideration by a majority vote we are setting aside a rule of the House, which is in effect a suspension of the rules, and requires a two-thirds vote. I think the gentleman's argument has force in it. The rule having sent the bill to us for consideration, of course if we undertake to say by a mere matter of a majority vote in the committee that we will not consider this subject matter, we have set aside the operative effect of a rule of the House, of a rule under which we are acting, and which is therefore the charter of our authority to act.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Suppose the Chair should hold that a majority vote of the committee could refuse to consider this bill and the committee rose and went back into the House. Suppose the Speaker held that it took a two-thirds vote to carry out the wishes of the committee and failed to get the two-thirds vote, we would immediately go into Committee of the Whole and be in the anomalous position of being in committee and refusing to consider the bill. The result of that would be that we would go right around in a circle.

Mr. WATKINS. The Committee of the Whole having been appointed by the House to do a certain piece of work, having objected to that, would not it feel constrained to be governed, if not by a parliamentary standard, would not they be constrained to follow the instructions of the House and pass to some other legislation?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That was not the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARNER. If the Chair should rule that it only took a majority in committee to refuse to consider the bill and it went back into the House and it took a two-thirds vote to confirm the action of the committee, you would have the anomalous position of a two-thirds vote in the House and only a majority vote in the committee refusing to go on with the bill. It shows from a logical standpoint, in my judgment, that the Chair ought not to hold that the Committee of the Whole can refuse to consider a bill after the House has sent it there.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. On House bills you go into Committee of the Whole by motion.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, by vote on a motion.

Mr. FESS. A vote to go into Committee of the Whole is a vote to consider the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That point was presented by the gentleman from Georgia, and in my judgment it was well taken.

Mr. FESS. And it requires a majority vote?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. On bills on the Union Calendar you do not go into Committee of the Whole by motion?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, automatically.

Mr. FESS. Therefore if in Committee of the Whole you can raise the question of consideration where we have gone into Committee of the Whole automatically to consider a bill, and you raise the question of consideration and refuse to consider it, do not you suspend the rules of the House?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the same proposition the gentleman presented before.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman means to say, as I understand, that a majority of the Committee of the Whole, where a quorum is 100, suspends the rules of the House where it takes a two-thirds vote of the House and where the quorum is 217.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the same proposition that the gentleman presented a few moments ago.

Mr. FESS. One other question and I am done. Do not the rules of the House applicable to the Committee of the Whole specify the motions that can be made in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not recall any body of motions that is provided for in terms. The rules say that the rules of the House shall be used in the Committee of the Whole so far as applicable. It is a question of interpretation whether they are applicable, or not. For instance, you can not move in the Committee of the Whole to lay an appeal from the ruling of the Chairman on the table. There is no reason for this, but it is stated as a general proposition that you can not make the motion to lay on the table, in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESS. This is a conclusion to which I come, that, unless specified either expressly or inferentially, in Committee of the Whole you can not make use of any motion except those that are clearly necessary for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the same thought that I endeavored to present in an earlier portion of my remarks, namely that in determining whether a thing is applicable in Committee of the Whole, you must take some rule that is applicable in the House, and then determine whether it is operative and applicable in the committee. But this rule has been held to deprive the Members of the House of the right to raise the question of consideration to this bill, while affording this right to members of the committee. This I say, is an illogical conclusion.

Mr. FESS. So do I.

Mr. ADAMSON. Suppose we follow that through. Those rules do not clothe the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with power to do something which the House itself can not do under the rules.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the very argument I have been seeking to present, and it is the same thought presented a moment ago by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. HAY. What would be the result if the Chairman holds this to be in order and the question is taken on the motion to consider? What is going to prevent the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] from calling up this bill and going back into the Committee of the Whole when we get back into the House?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Nothing. When we get back into the House, we will automatically, unless we get rid of this bill by a two-thirds vote, go back into the Committee of the Whole, and then when we get back into the Committee of the Whole the question of consideration will have to be raised again. Having been originally made in the Committee of the Whole, it could be renewed in the Committee of the Whole. This course will not be in contravention of any action taken by the House. The House has not acted. It has merely been notified by the committee that it will not consider the bill. Thereupon the gentleman from Louisiana can call up the same bill and automatically we will go back into Committee of the Whole. Hence we are in a position that in order to get rid of this bill, we must make the motion to dispense with the same and sustain that motion by a two-thirds vote. Why take such a view as this, instead of the more natural view, that consideration can not be raised in the Committee of the Whole. This does not tie our hands. We can go back into the House, and make the motion to dispense.

It is suggested to me by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] that this ruling to which so much reference has been made has not been produced. I have not undertaken to consider that ruling, or to argue with respect to its propriety. While the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia emphasizes the propriety of sustaining the point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] it is not necessary in this connection to address ourselves to that supposed decision. I am taking it for granted that it existed, but the limits of the same, and the extent thereof, and the circumstances under which it was made, would be very important matter, if it was necessary to determine whether or not that decision ought to stand. That inquiry, however, is not necessary in this connection.

Mr. Chairman, I would have finished my remarks long ago but for suggestions and inquiries that have been made from the floor, and which required, and properly so, some discussion and consideration. I wish to emphasize, in conclusion, the proposition that when the objection is made that we are creating distinctions—and that is the only objection that has been made with respect to the proposition that the motion to dispense could be applied to this bill—you should bear in mind that the distinction has already been created by the ruling that the question of consideration can not be raised in the House against bills from the Union Calendar. Now that this distinction has been created you should not create a new distinction by conferring upon the members of the Committee of the Whole the right to raise the question of consideration as to bills of this class. This is at variance with the established practice of the House. The committee is but an arm of the House, and when we provide material for its consideration it matters not whether this is done by virtue of an automatic operation of the rules, or by a vote of the House, it is beyond the authority of the committee to say that it will not proceed to deal with this material. Such action on its part, is a contempt of the authority of the body which creates it. The thing created, raises its puny arm against its creator. The point of order of the gentleman from Virginia should be sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] raises a new question as to how far the House by a two-thirds vote can suspend with Calendar Wednesday. He says we can dispense with consideration of any bill by a two-thirds vote. If that should be the ruling, I would not say that it were an absurd ruling; but it would have an absurd effect, because under that provision, if a majority of the House did not want to consider a bill, it would still be without power to refuse to do so, and would inevitably lead to a minority of the House forcing a majority of the House to waste time on a bill that it had no intention of considering. The rule is:

> On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order, except as provided by paragraph 4 of this rule, unless the House by a two-thirds vote on motion to dispense therewith shall otherwise determine.

The term "therewith" applies to something. To what does it apply? There are two things in this language, to either one of which the term "therewith" might apply. One is "business" and one is paragraph 4 of this rule. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] contends, in effect, that the term "therewith" applies to "business," and that the rule would say:

> On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order unless the House by two-thirds vote on motion to dispense therewith shall otherwise determine.

But the ruling has always been, and everyone else has understood, that the term "therewith" applied to the language in paragraph 4 of this rule as though it read, "and unless the House by a two-thirds vote dispenses with paragraph 4 of this rule, the business shall proceed," and so forth.

Paragraph 4 is the one that provides for Calendar Wednesday. On a number of occasions the question has been raised as to whether the House on Calendar Wednesday, by motion, might proceed with the consideration of other business temporarily for an hour or until a certain bill was dispensed with; and, while I think there has been no ruling on the subject, it has been stated from the chair, both by the present Speaker and the former Speaker, that that could not be done—that the House on Wednesday had the right at any time when in the House to dispense with further proceedings under the Calendar Wednesday rule—that is, paragraph 4 of Rule XXIV—and when dispensed with that ended Calendar Wednesday for that day.

Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] contends that the House may have a roll call on each bill that is called up on Wednesday to see whether or not it would dispense with these proceedings, and that it takes a two-thirds vote to carry that. That is not raising the question of consideration, and there is nothing in the rules to warrant a ruling to the effect that by a two-thirds vote in the House you can dispense with any particular bill on Calendar Wednesday. Of course, such an arbitrary ruling might be made. If it shall be made, I am perfectly willing to bow to it. It would not, however, be following the rules, it would be an absolutely arbitrary ruling, and it would not protect the House, and what we are seeking to do is to have a ruling which gives to the House, resolved into the Committee of the Whole House, or other way, the power to say whether it will proceed with the consideration of a particular bill. There is no other proposition which can be presented to the House where it has not the power to determine whether it will proceed. The very language of the rule says that "any bill or proposition" coming before the House, and, in effect, says you can raise the question of consideration. Now it is urged that the House place itself in a position where upon a Union Calendar bill it is without power to protect itself from having its time wasted in the consideration of a bill where perhaps a majority of the House has already determined that they will vote against the bill and do not desire to take the time of weeks or months for the consideration of a bill which has no chance of being passed by a majority of the House. That is the reason we have the right to raise the question of consideration on ordinary bills. A Member has the right to call up a bill, and if the House should determine it will not pass the bill, what is the use of wasting time on it? Now, I do not make these remarks about this bill. I would be willing now to vote to pass the bill under suspension. I have no opposition to the present bill. I do not profess to know just what is in it, and I never expect to learn just what is in it. I know two things. I know that it has been considered by the committee that it will waste the time of Calendar Wednesdays from now until probably the end of the session, and whether it passes now or later, it has no more chance of becoming a law in this Congress than a snowflake has to last forever in the nether regions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to state, in the first place, that he believes that there ought to be some opportunity at some time for either the House or the committee to determine the question of consideration of any bill, and by a majority vote. The Chair has great respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], but he can not agree with him that this rule is intended to enable the House to dispense with a part of Calendar Wednesday. As the Chair reads the rule and construes it, he is persuaded to believe that it means to dispense with the entire business of the day, or none. There are several reasons; among them there are several decisions of the Speakers of the House that there shall be no preference between House bills and Union Calendar bills upon the calendar on Wednesday. While it is admitted and has frequently been ruled that a majority vote on a House Calendar bill will prevent its consideration, and the argument is made which, if correct, would require a two-thirds vote to dispense with one that was on the Union Calendar, so there would be a distinction. Now, if this were an original proposition, the Chair is disposed to believe that he would have held that under Rule III that the consideration could have been raised before the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House. The Chair knows that question may be raised where a motion is made to go into the Committee of the Whole House to consider a bill. The rule reads this way:

> When any motion or proposition is made, the question, Will the House now consider it? will not be put, unless demanded by a Member.

It says "any motion or proposition." The Chair is inclined to believe that this was intended to cover cases of this sort. When a bill is called it is a proposition, it would seem to the Chair, to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider the bill, not a motion, because you automatically go into the Committee of the Whole House to consider a bill on the calendar, if on the Union Calendar, as this bill was. If it were an original proposition, he would feel disposed to hold that at that time the question of consideration might have been raised in the House. But the Chair is impressed with the belief that there ought to be some time when a majority of the House or the Committee of the Whole House can determine whether or not it will consider a bill. In view of the ruling of Speaker Cannon and Speaker pro tempore Mr. ALEXANDER, who, in this very case, decided when the motion was made raising the question of consideration that it could not be raised at that time. I think the opportunity to raise the question should now be permitted. Speaker Cannon decided that after you go into the Committee of the Whole House in a matter exactly like this——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the Chair a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Suppose it was not Calendar Wednesday and a motion was made to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider an appropriation bill; could you raise the question of consideration on that sort of a proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. A vote upon the motion would then determine the question of whether you would consider that bill or not.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I am not undertaking to argue against the ruling of the Chair, but if the Chair will permit I desire to say, as I understand the Chair, it is that the fundamental trouble here is an erroneous opinion heretofore delivered. Now the fact that that opinion was an error in respect to taking away the rights of the House with respect to raising the question of consideration can not affect a proper determination of the balance of the law as it stands. But for that ruling we would not be in this kind of difficulty of interpretation, but now an erroneous ruling ought not to affect a proper interpretation of what is left.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not feel disposed to overrule the decisions of Speaker Cannon and the decision of the Acting Speaker, Mr. ALEXANDER, in this very case. Something has been said about not finding the decision rendered by Mr. Speaker Cannon, and the parliamentary clerk advises the Chair that he has not found the actual decision. But there are a number of references to it that the Chair thinks are just as forceful. Here is a brief statement made in argument by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] upon that question to Speaker Cannon while he occupied the chair. Referring to that decision having been made by him—and certainly it must have been perfectly understood by the Speaker at that time that he had made that decision—he said:

> Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but early in the operation of this day under the rule, when the Chair held that a bill on the Union Calendar did not require a formal motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but the House went automatically into the Committee of the Whole House, it was held that after the House had resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the question of consideration could be raised.

Now, that was an argument made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to Speaker Cannon, referring to a former decision that he had made. So the Chair thinks there is no question but the ruling of Mr. Speaker Cannon was that way, and certainly Speaker pro tempore ALEXANDER, temporarily presiding here in this very matter, ruled that the question could not be raised in the House. The Chair does not feel disposed, in the brief time that he occupies the chair, to overrule these precedents. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven Members are present, a quorum. The question is, Shall the bill before the House be now considered?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not a good plan to observe the form of the rule there?

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Kansas the rule before him?

Mr. MURDOCK. I refer to clause 3 of Rule XVI.

Mr. MANN. It is, "Will the committee now consider?"

Mr. MURDOCK. I think we ought to follow the rule, which is, "Shall the House now consider it?"

The CHAIRMAN. It is simply a question of using the word "House" instead of "committee."

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; that is my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that all the rules of the House apply to the Committee of the Whole House where they are applicable.

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Can you now apply subsidiary motions as to this motion in the Committee of the Whole, such as laying the matter on the table, and so forth?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the question of consideration can now be raised.

Mr. FESS. In other words, you are not now, in Committee of the Whole, on the same basis as you would be on if you were in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. No. You can not under the rule. As many as favor the proposition of the consideration of this bill will say "aye," and those who are of the contrary opinion will say "no."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Chairman. First, however, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Has not that got to be taken by tellers, under the rule?

Mr. BARTLETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. The question, as I understand it, is that those who are in favor of considering the bill will answer "aye"?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The question was not so put.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am very sure that the membership did not understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed it does not require a vote by tellers. Therefore the Chair will state the question again. The question is now whether this bill will be considered. Those who favor that will vote in the affirmative and those opposed will vote in the negative.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Has it not, under the rules of the House, got to be taken by tellers?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WATKINS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 62.

Mr. WATKINS. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. WATKINS and Mr. MANN took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 59.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the committee refuses to consider the bill.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WATKINS] moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Let us have a division on that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. No; let us sit here. There is nothing we can do.

The CHAIRMAN. Division is called for.

Mr. MANN. Let them have the responsibility.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is passed.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is not passed yet. It was voted down.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 3.

So the motion to rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15578, and had determined to refuse to further consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 15578, had determined to consider it no further.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, on the call of committees, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 15578.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order. That the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in consideration of the bill just reported had no authority to refuse to consider the bill, and that the report which they made is one that the House should not receive.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, to add to the gayety of the situation, I move that the House direct the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the bill, whatever the number of it is. Let us have it all decided at once.

Mr. BARTLETT. I raised a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I have made a motion. I hope that somebody will make a point of order on the motion, so that the Chair will have a chance to rule on it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I made the point of order in all seriousness and good faith that the report made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to the effect that that committee had had under consideration this bill—the number I do not recollect now—and had directed him to make a report stating that the committee had decided not to consider the bill—I make a point of order that that is not a report which the House can receive, because the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had no power or authority to take any such action—to refuse to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would state that point over again.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir. I make the point of order upon the report made by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, which had under consideration the bill whose number I have forgotten, but which I will supply, which the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering, to the effect that that committee had decided not to consider the bill upon the question of consideration being raised, and that that report is not one such as the House could receive, because the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in the consideration of that bill, had no authority to consider that question, and its action in that regard was ultra vires.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy but little of your time, because you were in the Chamber and heard the argument, when this matter was up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole. I desire, however, to call your attention to one proposition in support of the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

If it is considered that the Committee of the Whole had authority to refuse to consider at its last session this particular bill, and to bring the same back into the House, then we are confronted with this situation: If you receive that report, then we are still under the call of committees, and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] can certainly call up the same bill. We are now not in Committee of the Whole, but in the House. The action of the Committee of the Whole can not limit the right of the gentleman from Louisiana, to call up this bill in the House. When he does this, as he will have the right to do, then we will automatically go back into Committee of the Whole, and should the committee again refuse to consider the bill, another motion will bring us back into the House. This shows what a vicious circle was started, when the ruling was made that the Committee of the Whole, with reference to this bill, had the authority to do, what it has undertaken to do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question. What would be the use of refusing to consider the bill any further if you immediately went back into the committee to consider it again?

Mr. SAUNDERS. There would be none. That is the very argument that I am making, Mr. Speaker. A little section of the House has undertaken to do something that the House has not done, and can not do. A section created under the rules of the House, a committee formed to deal with matters committed to its consideration, has undertaken to refuse to act upon a matter solemnly referred to its attention by the automatic operation of the rules of the House. It has made a report of its refusal to do business, to the House. We are now dealing with this matter in the House. The House is certainly not bound by the refusal of the committee to act upon material that was referred to its consideration by virtue of and pursuant to the rules of this body. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] can now call up the same bill. He has the right to do this, and the moment that he calls up this bill, just as would be the case with respect to any other bill from the Union Calendar, the rules of the House automatically operate to carry us back into Committee of the Whole.

The query propounded by the Chair to me very sufficiently shows, I think, the sufficiency of the point of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], and that is that a committee can not exercise authority forbidden to the House of Representatives, and refuse to deal with matter referred to its disposition, to be either voted up, or down after the consideration provided for by the rules.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I yielded the floor only to let the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] make a point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] is not entitled to the floor any more. He is out of this. [Laughter.] His committee has already had the call for two days. He can not call up a bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the exact matter before the House?

The SPEAKER. The exact matter is the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]——

Mr. MANN. And the motion that I made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to make his motion.

Mr. MURDOCK. The point of order of the gentleman from Georgia is against what? That is what I would like to know.

The SPEAKER. He raised the point of order that the Committee of the Whole was acting ultra vires when it made this report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is of the utmost importance that in every parliamentary body there should always be the opportunity for a majority of the members to determine in the beginning whether or not they desire to consider or not consider a piece of legislation. If a majority of this House has not the opportunity to determine whether that majority wishes to consider a piece of legislation, then you would be in the anomalous condition where some Member of the House could enforce the consideration of a bill or resolution against the will of the majority and make them wait impatiently until the time came around when they could vote on its final disposition.

Now, no such condition should or could properly exist in a parliamentary body. Of course, in the House there is always an opportunity for the House to raise the question of consideration. On an ordinary bill it is made by a motion; on an appropriation bill it has been held that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union raises the question of consideration, and therefore it is not necessary to make the direct motion for consideration. But we have adopted a rule in reference to Wednesday by which the House automatically takes a bill and goes into the committee without a vote. If that rule is lived up to, there is no opportunity in the House, after the chairman of a committee calls up a bill, for the House to determine whether or not it desires to consider the bill before it resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Now, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is merely a fiction, adopted for convenience to limit debate in certain ways and to prevent the necessity of numerous roll calls. That is its purpose; but, as a matter of fact, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is the House of Representatives; and although you can not call the roll in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the action of that committee voices the sentiment of the House. I think it is very clear, although there may be no direct ruling, that the House, either in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, should properly have the right to determine whether it will consider a piece of legislation—in the inception of that legislation, rather than in its final conclusion—and that it ought not to be left within the power of one man to force this House to consider a bill to its final conclusion when the sentiment of the House, expressed either in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, is against it. Therefore I think the logic of the situation and the logic of the rules must lead us to the conclusion, first, that this House shall have an opportunity to express itself; second, that if it has no opportunity in the House before going into the committee to express itself, the right to express itself must be given to it after it arrives in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Now, my friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] calls the attention of the Speaker to the fact that possibly after the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had refused to consider a bill, and it came back into the House, the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill might move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on this same bill again, or ask that it automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole. I say that that is no different from the conditions in the House. If a bill is on the calendar and I move that it be taken up, or if it comes before the House in its regular order, to be considered in the House, and some gentleman on the floor does not desire its consideration, he can raise the question of consideration, and if the House votes it down, it goes back to the calendar. Now, there is nothing to prevent that bill coming up again the first time that the man in charge of it can bring it up. He may bring it up in 10 minutes if he gets the opportunity, or he can bring it up the next week, and again the question of consideration may be raised. So that there is nothing in the rules of the House that would prevent that. It might be difficult to reach it again, but there is nothing in these rules that prevents it. I think the whole thing applies itself to common sense. When the House had refused by a majority vote to consider a bill, I do not think any Member on the floor of the House would attempt again immediately to get the bill before the House, to have it voted down again, and I do not assume that any chairman of a committee would do so foolish a thing as again to ask the House to consider a bill when the House, in the only legitimate way in which it could express itself, had refused to consider the bill, unless there was a change of circumstances and conditions which might warrant him to believe that the sentiment in the House had changed. Therefore I think, for the orderly disposition of business, and in order that this House may have an opportunity at all times to express itself as to whether or not it proposes to consider a measure in its inception, the correct ruling should be to conform to the ruling that has just been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], who occupied the chair in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the Chair will permit me a word, I wish to point out what I think is a very material flaw in the gentleman's logic. The gentleman from Alabama has undertaken to argue that the rule is one way, because in his judgment it ought to be that way. The argument that he offers in that connection is, as I have suggested, imperfect by reason of the fact that the position which he takes does not give the House any opportunity to raise the question of consideration. He argues that the House ought to have this opportunity; but according to his own contention the House is never afforded the opportunity of raising the question of consideration. It is raised in a committee, where a quorum is 100. It is never raised in the House, where the quorum is a majority of the elected members of this body.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated that I regarded the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as only a fiction, only a representative of the House itself.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, but the gentleman can not take that view and maintain it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, yes, I can.

Mr. SAUNDERS. He can not, for the simple reason that we have created a whole body of parliamentary law applicable in the House, that does not operate in the Committee of the Whole. Moreover we have expressly provided that a quorum of the Committee of the Whole is 100, and not a majority of the Members of this House. So you can not regard the Committee of the Whole as being in any real sense the House. It is an arm of the House. It is not the House, or the equivalent of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest to the gentleman what a ridiculous fix that might get us into. There are 435 Members of the House; 100 Members make a quorum of the Committee of the Whole. One hundred Members may have voted down the consideration of a bill, but when it gets back automatically into the Committee of the Whole again that 100 Members may have gone to the baseball game, and another hundred Members may have come in, and they may reverse the action of the first 100. That may be repeated many times. There may be four full committees with entirely different personnel, and 35 to spare. That is not the action of the House at all.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is logically true, and that punctures the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman from Alabama is seeking to give the House what he says the House ought to have, namely the right at some time to raise the question of consideration. The decision that has been so often cited holds that this question of consideration can not be raised in the House. Now the gentleman from Alabama seeks to give this right to the House by giving it to the committee. The right of consideration in the committee is an entirely different proposition from the right of consideration in the House. Consideration can be refused in the Committee of the Whole by 51, a majority of a quorum, when, if the motion was made in the House, the House might overwhelmingly vote the other way.

Mr. MURDOCK and Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in a moment.

Mr. MURDOCK. In addition to what the gentleman says, I wish he would point out to the Speaker that in Committee of the Whole there is no record vote, while in the House there is, which is a material fact.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly. It is not material that the right of consideration be given to the Committee of the Whole, which is as I have said, merely an arm of the House. It differs from any other committee only in the fact that the quorum is larger, and the powers given broader. It merely considers and reports. The raison d'etre of a committee is to consider what is sent to it. As has been heretofore pointed out, all the strained construction that the Chair is asked to place upon our rules, is due to the effort to maintain a decision that was not originally sound. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] frankly said if he had been in the chair at the time he would have rendered a different decision. Now because that decision is in the way of the question of consideration in the House, it does not follow that other and more violent decisions ought to be rendered. The law as it is ought to be interpreted. New law ought not to be made merely to meet a situation created by an erroneous decision that ought to be overruled.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not see any difficulty about this situation at all. The rules of a parliamentary body must be founded on common sense and with a view to the carrying on of business. I always apply myself, as far as I can in the consideration of a question, to what is the common-sense proposition involved. It has already been ruled that you can not raise the question of consideration on this bill in the House. It has also been ruled in committee that you can raise it in committee. I think both of these rulings are correct and must be sustained by the Speaker. But the action of the committee is not and never is final. The action of the Committee of the Whole House is reported to the House itself, and while the form of the motion is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House, and so forth, and it is the House that is sitting as a Committee of the Whole House, still the rights in the two bodies are somewhat different, and especially in the fact that the Committee of the Whole does not entertain a roll call upon propositions while the roll call is in order in the House. The committee getting the bill reports backs the bill with recommendations. It agrees to amendments in the committee and recommends those amendments to the House. It agrees to a favorable report on the passage of the bill and recommends the passage of the bill in the House; or it may agree to an adverse report in the committee and recommend that the bill be laid on the table or that the enacting clause be stricken out. The committee takes no final action as to any matter reported back to the House. I think it is perfectly clear that when the committee has reported back a bill recommending that in committee the committee has decided not to consider the bill referred to it, that that is subject to the approval or disapproval of the House, and that it is now in order for the Speaker to put to the House the question whether the House agrees to the recommendation of the committee in regard to this bill.

The committee has recommended that the bill be not considered in Committee of the Whole. That is, at the best of it, a recommendation, and that lets us out of what would be an embarrassing position. We can not well sustain ourselves and say that the House can not control the action of the committee and direct that a bill be considered in the committee. It might easily happen that some day the House might resolve itself into Committee of the Whole with only a few Members present, go into committee with only a few Members present, possibly Members who had been notified in advance to be present for the purpose of voting in the committee not to consider a bill. The bill might be reported back to the House and the House agree to the recommendation that the bill be not considered. If the House disagrees to the recommendation, I think the logic would be that you follow the same policy you follow when it reports a bill adversely and the House disagrees to the recommendation—it goes back to the committee, and the committee will resume and proceed with the consideration of the bill.

I think that now the Speaker should put to the House the question whether the House will agree to the recommendation of the committee on this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand the position of the gentleman from Illinois to be that it is now in order for the House to take up the question as to whether or not it will concur in the report of the committee to not further consider the bill.

Mr. MANN. I think that is the proper proceeding.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. If the House should vote in favor of the motion, would not that be equivalent to postponing the bill indefinitely?

Mr. MANN. It would be equivalent to putting the bill on the calendar, like every other bill, to be taken up when it is reached in regular order. It would not make any difference between this bill and any other bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, there are precedents where reports of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union have been resisted upon the ground that it was in excess of the authority of the committee. I refer the Speaker to the Manual, section 328:

But a committee may not report a recommendation which, if carried into effect, would change a rule of the House. When a report is ruled out as an excess of the committee's power the accompanying bill stands recommitted.

So that, Mr. Speaker, under that authority, which will be found in the fourth volume of Hinds' Precedents, section 4907, and on page 121 of the Manual, the Speaker must decide whether or not the Committee of the Whole, in directing the Chairman to make that report, will be accepted, or whether the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had the power to make it. The Chair correctly stated the proposition that the question is whether or not the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has acted ultra vires in reporting that the bill be not further considered, which contravenes the rules of the House. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union can not authorize a Chairman to report a bill with a recommendation which is in excess of the powers of the committee to consider. If the House went into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering certain bills, it could not take up other bills and report them. If it went into Committee of the Whole for doing certain work and had gone beyond that and had done other work and reported it out, it is beyond the power of the committee. So the whole question comes right now for the decision of the Speaker whether or not the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union exceeded its authority when it entertained a motion not to consider the bill that was pending before it, which had been committed to it by direction of the House to be considered under the rules of the House. The question is whether the Committee of the Whole, a mere branch of the House, is greater in power than the House itself.

It has been said, and said correctly, that the House itself can not entertain a question of consideration when a motion is made to go into the Committee of the Whole, and it is immaterial whether that arises on Wednesday or any other day, the rule is the same. If it rises on any other day than Wednesday, you can not entertain the question of consideration, because the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is a motion to consider. I will refer the Speaker to the authorities and precedents which I called the attention of the Chair to in committee.

The uniform decision is that when a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a bill that that is equivalent to the question of consideration. And before the establishment of Calendar Wednesday you could not raise the question of consideration. I learned that early in my congressional career, for I raised that question myself on a bill on a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the chairman, Mr. Dalzell, ruled that raising the question of consideration was not allowable.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not contend that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union would not have power to report a bill for the adoption of the House or recommend its enactment or that it would exceed its power if it reported against the adoption of a bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not contend that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union would not have the power to do anything in recommending the position of a bill provided it did not violate the rules of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman admits those two propositions now whether or not it is equally within the power of the committee to report to the House that it thinks it unwise to further consider a bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the committee has a right to do that, because the committee can not consider the question raised, or have the question of consideration raised before it. That is the whole argument I have made here.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The position of the Chairman in making the ruling was that the House should have a chance to consider the question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And if not given in the House, it ought to be given in the committee. That same position was approved by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. This is the question I desire to ask. The question of consideration is never raised in order to have a bill considered. It is always raised by those who do not want to consider the bill. The question used to be put in the negative form, objecting to the consideration of the bill. In every single organization the matter will be considered, unless some one raises the question of consideration. I do not understand the force of such reasoning, that it must be in the House or it must be in the Committee of the Whole, because we have the right to have it considered. It always will be considered, unless some one raises the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, just one word. I intended to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling that when the committee had exceeded its authority——

The SPEAKER. Oh, there is no question about that. The committee can not exceed its authority. The question is whether it did or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be heard for a moment, if the Chair will indulge me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the whole trouble is due to the fact that we are trying to abide by a wrong decision made in the House. I appreciate that gentlemen frequently do not have time to fully examine questions, and with a proper respect for the learning and ability of the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. ALEXANDER, I think his decision was wrong when he held that you could not in the House on Calendar Wednesday raise the question of consideration on a bill. A two-thirds vote to dispense with Calendar Wednesday was fixed in the rule for the purpose of preventing the crowding in of other business as against matters that would be reached on that calendar, but it was not for the purpose of compelling the House always to consider a particular bill on the calendar, and the common-sense thing to do would be to let the House determine on Calendar Wednesday whether it will consider a bill on that calendar by raising the question of consideration. To have a Committee of the Whole, which is created for the purpose in this instance of considering a particular bill, determine that it will not do the very thing that the House has created it to do, is to bring about a condition in parliamentary law contrary to all reasoning. The House ought to have the opportunity to arrive at its will, and that opportunity ought to be had by reversing the decision rendered by Speaker pro tempore ALEXANDER that you could not raise the question of consideration on Calendar Wednesday as to a bill on the Union Calendar.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is in order on Calendar Wednesday to call up bills from either the House Calendar or the Union Calendar.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would anyone say, if a bill were called up from the House Calendar, that the question of consideration could not be raised upon that bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think one could successfully say that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That being true, the only reason the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House automatically—and I am making these observations in sustaining the idea of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and with his indulgence—without a motion is because the rule says that bills on the Union Calendar shall be considered in Committee of the Whole. The Speaker has held that the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; that it is not necessary to make a motion. If it were necessary to make a motion, of course, then the question of consideration need not be raised, because that would be determined, as it is in the case of privileged bills, by the motion to go into the committee; but inasmuch as under the rule the House resolves itself automatically into the committee, it does seem to me that there ought to be some opportunity at that time for raising the question of consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee, in making this argument, overlook the fact that the purpose of the rule in preventing a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole and requiring the House to automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was to prevent the question of consideration until we arrived in committee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is for no other purpose. The very purpose was to prevent a roll call at that time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In the first place, let me say to the gentleman that the rule does not say that the House shall automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The rule says that on Calendar Wednesday only certain business shall be in order, and then it says that bills may be called up from either the House Calendar or the Union Calendar and that bills on the Union Calendar shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The rule does not say that the House shall automatically resolve itself into the committee, but the Chair in the past has held that inasmuch as no other business is in order, except the business therein specified, and inasmuch as the rule provides that business on the Union Calendar shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that therefore automatically the House should resolve itself into the committee in order to save the loss of time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is right there that the vice of the whole thing lies, and it lies in the assumption that the only thing that is in order on Calendar Wednesday is a particular bill, whereas the purpose of Calendar Wednesday was not to compel the consideration of a particular bill, but to compel the consideration of that calendar and to prevent the disregard of that calendar except by a two-thirds vote, and the House ought to have the right, by raising the question of consideration, to determine what bill it desires to call up for consideration. And to then go to the absurdity, for that is the way it strikes me, because the ruling was that you could not have consideration in the House in the first instance, that then the committee, which is the creature of the House, created for the specific purpose of considering a bill, can deny the very purpose of its creation, is to make the creature greater than the creator.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the gentleman will permit, in other words, it is a question of going back and overruling an improper decision rather than proceeding to strain the rules further in order to get a further confusion.

Mr. SHERLEY. In my judgment, what we ought to do is to hold that the motion raising consideration in the committee was not in order, and then the committee should rise and should report the bill, and then the question of consideration in the House on Calendar Wednesday could be raised in accordance with natural parliamentary law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee Mr. Speaker, just one further observation I desire to make in connection with the suggestion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and that is that it would be next in order, and it would be the duty of the Speaker to put the question to the House whether it would sustain the action of the Committee of the Whole. Now, it is true that is a course to reach the end, but the gentleman from Illinois suggested, and we all agree with him, that he desired and we all desired to follow a common-sense method in reaching results through the rules of the House, but now I submit to the Speaker that that after all is not a common-sense method. What have we under that sort of practice? We have a provision in the House by a ruling of the Speaker pro tempore a few days ago to be followed that in the House the question of consideration can not be raised. Then you go into the Committee of the Whole House and raise the question. Then when you go back into the House the question indirectly is raised by the Speaker putting the proposition, Will the House sustain the action of the Committee of the Whole?—so that you go through two processes of reaching a result which by a simple application of common sense should be reached in the first instance on raising the question of consideration when the matter is originally called up?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, you can not raise the question of consideration in the House on a Union Calendar bill unless you have a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House. That motion was dispensed with because it was thought to be a time saver. It is not often the question of consideration is raised, and if you had to make a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House every time it would make quite a difference. Now, you can accomplish the whole purpose just as easily by reporting what the committee has recommended and submitting it to the House.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have not changed the views which I expressed when we were in the Committee of the Whole, and I regret very much, indeed, I am not able to agree with the gentlemen who have submitted the proposition to the Speaker that the ruling of the Committee of the Whole was ultra vires. In my opinion, from a hasty and cursory examination which I could make of this question, I am not satisfied that the proceeding was wrong. I am satisfied in the first place, from the rulings in this House, that the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], who was in the chair, and ruled as Acting Speaker that the bill was to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House automatically, without any motion, without any power on the part of the House, acted exactly in conformity with the rules of the House. After the bill had gone to the Committee of the Whole, and that committee being under the supervision of the House, or a creature of the House, that that committee had the right to submit the question to the House as to whether or not they should proceed with the consideration of the bill which was then on the calendar. From my understanding of the rule, all the committee did was—it simply said that it was authorized, or instructed, or empowered by the House to proceed with the consideration of this bill, and, by referring it back, declined to go any further with it, and therefore referred it back to the authority from which it received it.

I agree entirely with the gentleman from Illinois, except on one proposition. He expresses the view that the Speaker should submit the question to the House as to whether or not the bill should be proceeded with or considered in the Committee of the Whole, as indicated by the committee—whether the Speaker should or should not do that on his own part or his own motion. Under my view of the matter—and let me give that for what it is worth, not claiming to be a parliamentarian, but believing the situation is justified, and with due deference to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama, in which he seemed to condemn the very course which I am about to take—it was my intention to make a motion to the effect that we now go back into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of this bill that is upon the calendar for the purpose of getting a vote in the House upon that proposition. It is a fact that for the present that bill is eliminated from the Committee of the Whole. The same question which would have arisen when we first began to consider the bill when it was in the Committee of the Whole does not now arise. Then the Speaker held that we would automatically go back into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill which was being considered by the Committee of the Whole, and which bill was regularly upon the calendar. Now it is out of the Committee of the Whole, referred back to the House, and, with all due deference to the minority leader and the views expressed by others, for the purpose of having the Speaker secure a ruling I shall ask the privilege of moving to go back into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill for the purpose of letting the House vote upon that question.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MAPES. May I call the Speaker's attention to just one point which has not been brought out in the discussion thus far?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I hesitate to break in on the discussion of this point of order, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to me that the rights of the standing committees and the integrity of Calendar Wednesday are so much involved that I wish to call the Speaker's attention to the rule applying to Calendar Wednesday, which provides that each committee when named may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day and on the House Calendar. I submit the proposition to the Speaker and ask if it is not the right of the standing committee reporting this bill to have it considered under the rules of the House, and, having that right, is it not the duty of the House to vote it up or vote it down before they dispose of it? Is not the House obliged to consider it?

The SPEAKER. I think the gentleman has the ordinary call of committees and this Calendar Wednesday call mixed up.

Mr. MAPES. And in that connection, if the Speaker will bear with me further for a moment, just to make myself clear, I want to call attention to section 3142 of Hinds' Precedents, which says:

The right of a committee to report at any time carries with it the right to have the matter reported considered.

Section 3145 says:

A bill reported by a committee under its right to report at any time remains privileged for consideration until disposed of.

I am only reading the headings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not talking about Calendar Wednesday, or the man who wrote that book was not.

Mr. MAPES. But if the House can prevent the consideration of any bill reported by a standing committee, does it not destroy the integrity of Calendar Wednesday, and does it not prevent the standing committees of the House from their right to have a bill considered? As said in Hinds' Precedents, "the right of a committee to report carries with it the right to have the matter reported considered." That is the point which I desired to call to the Speaker's attention, because it seemed to me it should be considered in connection with the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I have a suggestion to make on this point of order. Paragraph 4 of Rule XXIV, relating to Calendar Wednesday, says:

After the unfinished business has been disposed of the Speaker shall call each standing committee in regular order and then select committees, and each committee, when named, may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day and on the House Calendar. * * *

The SPEAKER. That does not apply to Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. COOPER. I was reading paragraph 4 of Rule XXIV, and this paragraph 4 is expressly made to apply to Calendar Wednesday by paragraph 7 of the same rule, which paragraph 7 provides that—

On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4 of this rule.

Observe that language: "No business is in order on Wednesday except as provided by paragraph 4."

And paragraph 4, which I have read, provides that a committee, when reached on the call of committees, shall have the right to call up any bill previously reported by it and on the House Calendar. And paragraph 7 provides that no business shall be in order on Wednesday except such bills so reported by and called up by committees on that day unless the House, by a two-thirds vote, shall dispense with Calendar Wednesday itself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is to be held that the House by a mere majority vote can refuse consideration when a committee calls up a bill on Calendar Wednesday, it would be in absolute violation of paragraphs 4 and 7, for those paragraphs plainly declare that nothing but bills called up by committees shall be in order on Calendar Wednesday, unless by a two-thirds vote the House shall dispense with Calendar Wednesday itself. This clearly means that every bill so called up on that day by a committee shall be considered unless Calendar Wednesday shall be set aside by a two-thirds vote of the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the other ruling will mean that a majority of the Committee of the Whole can nullify the rule.

Mr. COOPER. Not at all. The Committee of the Whole can not do that. Paragraph 4 provides that on Calendar Wednesday, when the Speaker calls the roll of committees, any committee when reached may call up any bill previously reported by it and on the House Calendar; and paragraph 7 provides that on that day no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4——

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the gentleman's position is eminently correct. Under rules adopted for the Committee of the Whole, and which we are now considering, you would not on Calendar Wednesday permit the House, by a majority vote, to dispense with the business, but you would permit the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with only a hundred Members, to dispense with all the business?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; but, in my judgment, the Committee of the Whole has no such power.

Mr. POU. And I would like to ask if it does not give the right to one man to abrogate Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. BARTLETT. I think so.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The rule does not say the House shall consider the bill. The rule says the committee may call up the bill for consideration, but the question of consideration can be raised on any particular bill, as it is sometimes raised. The House then can choose to go ahead. Of course, if the House should refuse to consider any bill on the calendar, why, Calendar Wednesday might run out; but that would be a very asinine performance.

Mr. COOPER. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois it is sufficient to say that the question of consideration can be raised in the House on any day, except on the call of committees on Calendar Wednesday. Calendar Wednesday was made expressly for the purpose of giving to any committee, when called by the Speaker, the power to call up any bill which it sees fit to call up, and paragraph 7 declares that no business shall be in order on that day except a bill so called up by a committee, unless the House not by a mere majority shall refuse consideration, but unless the House by a two-thirds vote shall dispense with Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does he think that it is sound parliamentary philosophy that the House or any other legislative body should have a rule which would so bind it as that a simple committee of that House could compel it, against the wish of a great majority, to consider a bill?

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Tennessee is too good a lawyer to put that question. The question is not what the rule ought to be, but what it is. It would require an amendment of paragraphs 4 and 7 of Rule XXIV to enable the House to refuse consideration on Calendar Wednesday. That is the exact point. The gentleman from Tennessee speaks of a simple committee compelling consideration of a bill. But it is not a simple committee which compels consideration of a bill on Calendar Wednesday. It is the rule which compels this, unless Calendar Wednesday itself is duly dispensed with. That is the precise reason why the rule establishing Calendar Wednesday was adopted.

Paragraph 7 provides that on Wednesday no other business shall be in order except as provided in paragraph 4; and the only business provided for in paragraph 4 is bills called up by committees on the call of committees. Under the rule, therefore, it is plain that such bills are the only business in order on Calendar Wednesday and must be considered unless Calendar Wednesday itself is, by a two-thirds vote, set aside by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. There are several questions involved in this matter, and the Chair will try to straighten them all out.

Until the Calendar Wednesday rule was made it was the privilege of any Member of the House to raise the question of consideration on any bill, resolution, or proposition. Speaker Reed once said that the purpose of all rules was to expedite business and not retard it. That is the correct light in which to examine them all.

The House has the right to do as it pleases about any bill, and should have a chance to express its opinion. If it does not want to consider it, it has a perfect right to say that it will not consider it. That is no abridgement of anybody's privilege. It is to maintain the integrity of the House. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has a very terse and luminous way of stating things, and on the 14th day of December, 1910, he delivered these remarks:

Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit me, it seems to me that the surest way to determine every debatable proposition is by answering the question, What ruling gives the House the greatest freedom? Now, the purpose of Calendar Wednesday was not to guarantee that certain committees should have certain bills considered, but that they should have an opportunity to present bills that they had reported, and then the House should have the right to say whether it would consider them or not—

And so forth. Now, until the Calendar Wednesday rule, as I said, was adopted, you could raise the question of consideration on any legislative proposition. Most of the men who have participated in this long debate here to-day—and the Speaker remained in the Chamber and heard every word—were here when this Calendar Wednesday rule was adopted, and we know precisely why it was adopted. In those same remarks the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] stated this:

The abuse that Calendar Wednesday was meant to cure was the constant feeding into the House of matters that had privilege and prevented the calling of the calendar; but it was not meant, by making a call of the calendar peremptory on certain days, to compel the House necessarily to consider matters on the calendar, but simply to give the House opportunity to consider them.

That is the exact truth about this, and the complaints that led to the adoption of Calendar Wednesday were precisely what the gentleman from Kentucky says they were—that committees went to work and reported bills and never got any chance to call them up. The call of the committees has been a part of the House proceedings, I suppose, from the beginning; anyhow, antedating any of us. But they fell into the habit of crowding privileged matters in here, sometimes on purpose and sometimes in the ordinary course of business, so that Members could not get their bills up at all, and therefore we established Calendar Wednesday. Nobody has any disposition to overthrow it. I know that the Chair has none.

The reading of that Calendar Wednesday rule is peculiar. It provides:

> On a call of committees under this rule bills may be called up from either the House or the Union Calendar, excepting bills which are privileged under the rules.

That last clause was put in there to prevent any of the big committees having jurisdiction of appropriations, revenue bills, and so forth, from crowding in on Calendar Wednesday. They have to stand aside on Wednesday and let somebody else have the right of way. The rule provides further:

> But bills called up from the Union Calendar shall be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Now, I differ with these gentlemen and I agree with Speaker Cannon and the temporary Speaker, Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not believe that any other reasonable construction can be put upon that clause except that it meant an automatic going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and the reason why that was done was to prevent filibustering on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I know that that is so, because I was here, and while I was not on the Committee on Rules, I participated in the establishment of that rule.

There must be some place, somewhere—there ought to be, at least—to raise the question of consideration; and failing to be able to raise the question of consideration in the House in the first instance on bills on the Union Calendar on Wednesday, it ought to be permitted to be raised in committee. As to the suggestion that somebody made—that 51 members in Committee of the Whole could upset the proceedings—the Chair is inclined to believe with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that when a report like this is brought in it ought to be ratified by the House.

The Chair does not believe that the committee is acting ultra vires when it reports to the House that it will not consider this bill any more on this occasion. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had its origin in England, and its history, which need not be stated here, is a very interesting one. It is simply a committee of the House, that is all it is; just like the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Appropriations, and so forth, except that 100 Members make a quorum, and 51 are a majority of a quorum. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has the right to make its recommendations to the House. Of course, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] suggested, it might make some recommendation which was beyond its power. Now, if anyone does not like this Calendar Wednesday rule, the right thing to do is to offer an amendment to it. That is easy enough to do.

In the first place, the Chair sustains the ruling of Speaker Cannon and of temporary Speaker ALEXANDER, and he sustains the contention that you may raise the question of consideration on Calendar Wednesday—on no other day—in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. On every other day you have the opportunity to raise it in the first instance in the House. The motion to go into the committee raises the question on every other day.

Secondly, the Chair thinks that in this case the motion ought to be put to the House, which is the greater body and the controlling body, as it takes 217 to make a quorum in the House, just as the House votes on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the committee reports back a bill with the recommendation that it lie on the table, or with the recommendation that the bill do not pass, or with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out, or that everything after the enacting clause be stricken out. The committee has the right to report any one of those recommendations.

Therefore the question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WATKINS. Before that question is put, I would like to have a quorum here to vote on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have the opportunity to raise that question in a moment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense——

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us vote on this. We can go into the gentleman's matter afterwards.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I will wait.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask that the question be stated again.

The SPEAKER. The question is whether the House will agree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union not to consider the bill any further at this time.

Mr. WATKINS. What does a vote "aye" mean?

The SPEAKER. A vote "aye" means that the House will not consider it any more on this particular Calendar Wednesday, and if that motion prevails, the bill goes back to its place on the calendar. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 167, answered "present" 2, not voting 149, as follows:

Mr. HARDWICK with Mr. EDWARDS.

Mr. MCKELLAR with Mr. NORTON, commencing April 8, ending April 25.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I have a pair with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings in order under the rule to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to dispense with further proceedings under the rule of Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WATKINS. The House has agreed to proceed with the consideration of the bill on the calendar, and if the business to-day is further dispensed with, will that bill be called up next Wednesday? I do not want to lose my place on the calendar. I want the House to have an opportunity to so further consider the bill as to retain its place.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that under the circumstances, as a matter of precedent, we ought to go back into Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Mr. WATKINS. I think it is safer to go back automatically.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to that view of the matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if I may make a statement, the purpose of my making the motion was that there is a message on the Speaker's table from the President of the United States, asking an immediate appropriation of $500,000 for the purpose of transporting American citizens in Mexico to their homes.

Mr. WATKINS. My purpose is to have the committee rise in a few moments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will withdraw my motion to dispense with further proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15578.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry. I would like to know if we can arrange about the distribution of time for general debate.

Mr. MANN. We can not arrange for that now.

Mr. MURDOCK. The bill has had its first reading?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I have an hour, and without consuming any time just now I will reserve what time I am entitled to, and move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of considering other important legislation.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Louisiana moved that the committee rise for the purpose of considering "other important legislation."

Mr. WATKINS. I simply made that as a statement and not as a part of my motion. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further business under the Calendar Wednesday rule for to-day.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF AMERICANS IN MEXICO (H. DOC. NO. 916).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the exigency created by the existing situation in the Republic of Mexico, I recommend the immediate passage by the Congress of an act appropriating $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be placed at the disposal of the President for the purpose of providing means to bring to their homes in the United States American citizens now in Mexico.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 22, 1914.

DANIEL ALOYSIUS HAGGERTY.

Mr. DEITRICK. Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps known to all the Members of Congress that in the fighting at Vera Cruz, Mexico, yesterday 4 United States marines were killed and about 20 wounded.

I am deeply grieved to announce that a young man, Daniel Aloysius Haggerty, of Cambridge, Mass., my home city, was the first to give his life in our attempt to compel due and proper respect for our country's flag on the part of the Provisional President of Mexico and his subordinates.

Mr. Haggerty was a well-trained marine with a splendid record in the service, which he entered in 1906. He had a high sense of personal honor and he fully realized the seriousness of the duties devolving upon a soldier in the defense of his country's honor. He was selected as one specially fitted for signal duty and met his death while performing this duty in an extremely dangerous and exposed position. He had just stepped out upon the roof of the Terminal Hotel, in Vera Cruz, when a bullet fired from a machine gun in the hands of the Mexicans, who were posted on the top of an old lighthouse tower, pierced his brain.

We might pause and contemplate that his death is another striking example of the patriotism of the citizens of Massachusetts, who are ever willing to make every sacrifice, even to the giving of their lives, when their country's honor is at stake. It was in Massachusetts, at Lexington, only a few miles from Cambridge, where the first American blood was shed in the War of the Revolution. On their way there the British troops marched through Cambridge. Many of them and some Americans lost their lives there. It was in Cambridge that Washington took command of the American Army. From Cambridge came the first company of volunteers, newly organized, for the Civil War.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEITRICK. Certainly.

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the gentleman that the first defenders came from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DEITRICK. That may be true; but the first volunteer company came from Cambridge, Mass. The Sixth Massachusetts Infantry was unquestionably the first Union volunteer regiment to reach Washington fully armed and equipped. Cambridge contributed her full quota of men in the Spanish War and in the Philippine insurrection, and now it is Cambridge that gives the first life required in the defense of the American flag in the present difficulty in Mexico.

I hold in my hand a telegram from Mr. Michael Haggerty, the young man's father, and it brings home to me, knowing how this loss must be felt, as I do, the grim realities of what this matter means. [Applause.]

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN MEXICO.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15906) providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the relief of American citizens in Mexico, including transportation to their homes in the United States, there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President.

The SPEAKER. I there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this bill conforms to the request of the President. I do not know that there is anything further to be said. Everybody understands the situation in Mexico and the necessity for providing the necessary funds for the transportation of American citizens.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SEAMEN'S BILL.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the seamen's bill now pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the seamen's bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MINE STRIKE IN COLORADO.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by quoting a telegram I have just received in respect to the mining trouble in Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram he has just received in respect to the mining trouble in Colorado. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, April 22, 1914.

FRANK B. WILLIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We petition you to use your influence in Congress to protect the miners and their wives and children from the onslaught of paid hirelings in Colorado. We believe that the Huertas should be driven out of America as well as Mexico.

Respectfully,

JOHN MOORE,
President Ohio Miners.
G. W. SAVAGE,
Secretary-Treasurer Ohio Miners.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, in connection with the discussion had this morning on the very lamentable occurrences at Ludlow, Colo., some telegrams which I have received and some remarks relative to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing some telegrams on the Ludlow occurrences and some remarks in respect thereto. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are the telegrams very numerous?

Mr. MONDELL. There are three short telegrams.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram sent to the congressional delegation from the State of Washington with reference to the Colorado matter and the loss of lives there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram about the Colorado mining trouble. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

Congressman J. W. BRYAN, or J. A. FALCONER, or W. L. LA FOLLETTE, or W. E. HUMPHREY, or ALBERT JOHNSON, Washington, D. C.:

We have received information from Colorado that the miners' tent colony at Ludlow has been burned to the ground and five striking miners, four women, and at least five children have been brutally killed. We, the executive board of District No. 10, United Mine Workers, representing the 6,000 mine workers of the State of Washington, register our indignant protest that a condition can be tolerated in this country which menaces not only our liberty but our homes and our very lives to an infinitely greater degree than has been occasioned by the overt action on the part of the authorities in Mexico; and we demand for our people in Colorado at least the same measure of protection that is being so vigorously demanded in Mexico, believing, as we do, that the Government should give its first consideration to that protection of the lives and liberty of our people that is guaranteed them in such unmistakable terms in the Constitution of these United States.

MARTIN J. FLYZIK, President.
WM. SHORT, Secretary.
E. NEWSHAM, Vice President.
ROBERT H. HARLIN,
International Board Member.

GEORGE POINSETT.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to George Poinsett, of Philadelphia, who was killed at Vera Cruz, Mexico, and in respect to similar occurrences in other wars where citizens of the State of Pennsylvania lost their lives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in the list of the American dead, as the toll of the first battle against Huerta's régime in Mexico yesterday, the name of a Pennsylvania boy stands at the head. George Poinsett, seaman, who was 20 years of age only a few days ago, was among the first Americans to give up their lives in the Battle of Vera Cruz. He was a Philadelphia boy and had enlisted in 1911, and had been assigned to the Florida.

The news of this morning's papers is not surprising to those who know the annals of Pennsylvania and the patriotic devotion of her citizens in every crisis of American history. Pennsylvania blood was the first shed in the strife of the sixties. When Lincoln had issued his first call for troops, Gov. Curtin telegraphed the call over the State, and so prompt was the response that five Pennsylvania companies claimed the proud badge of "First Defenders." When these troops passed through Baltimore they were mobbed and the first bloodshed of the war occurred in the injury of Nick Biddle, a Pennsylvanian, with those volunteers. It was the day following that a Massachusetts regiment was attacked in the streets of Baltimore.

Gov. Curtin said in a special message at the close of the war that "the resources of Pennsylvania, whether men or money, have neither been withheld nor squandered." The State furnished 270 regiments and several unattached companies, in all 387,284 men. Every regiment had its battle flag, with its name and the coat of arms of Pennsylvania. Most of these have been returned, tattered and torn, and the citizen who wishes to know something of the spirit of the State in days of storm and stress need only pay a visit to the State library at Harrisburg, where the emblems of a State's patriotism may be seen by all.

The history of Pennsylvania is the history of American patriotism. There has been a ready response from the Keystone State to every call of the country in time of need. In the War of the Revolution its soldiers were in the forefront of every battle of the eight years' struggle for freedom.

When the War of 1812 broke out Pennsylvania responded with three times as many troops as were required. It was the spirit of seventy-six again, and Gov. Snyder in his message to the general assembly expressed it as follows:

> The sword of the Nation, which for 30 years has rusted in its scabbard, has been drawn to maintain the independence which it so gloriously achieved. In the war of the Republic our fathers went forth, as it were, with a sling and a stone and smote the enemy. Since that period our country has been abundantly blessed and her resources greatly multiplied. Millions of her sons have grown to manhood and, inheriting the principles of their fathers, are determined to preserve the precious heritage which was purchased by their blood and won by their valor.

The same spirit was shown by Pennsylvania during the Mexican War of 1848. The State was asked for six regiments. It furnished nine, but they could not all be mustered into service. Pennsylvanians distinguished themselves for bravery in every battle, leading the van at Vera Cruz, Cerra Gordo, and Mexico City. In the Capitol Park at Harrisburg is a marble shaft erected by the State in honor of the valor of these Pennsylvania soldiers.

When the War with Spain became a fact, Pennsylvania well lived up to the patriotic record of the past, and more men volunteered in answer to the call of McKinley than were required.

It was a Pennsylvanian, John Peter Muhlenberg, who, when preaching in Woodstock, Va., one Sunday morning at the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, tore off his ministerial gown and displayed the full uniform of an American colonel. He read his commission in the Army, and almost every man in his congregation enlisted under him. A statue in his honor occupies one of the places allotted to Pennsylvania in Statuary Hall of this Capitol.

It was a Pennsylvanian, John Hazelwood, who commanded the American fleet in the Delaware River and threatened the defeat of the British early in the Revolutionary War. Lord Howe promised him a rich reward if he would withdraw his ships, but his answer was: "I will defend the fleet until the last man is killed."

It was a Pennsylvanian, Maj. Miller, who captured a battery which made the victory of Lundys Lane in the War of 1812 an accomplished fact. It was a Pennsylvanian, Capt. Dobbins, who made possible the victory of Lake Erie in that war and the sending of Commodore Perry's famous message, "We have met the enemy and they are ours."

It was a Pennsylvania, George Meade, who commanded the Union forces at Gettysburg and won the battle which marked the turning point in that great conflict.

Volumes would not contain the names of the Pennsylvanians who have lead the way in every crisis time in American history, offering up their lives and all that life held dear for their country in its time of peril. Impossible to tell of Molly Pitcher, of Cumberland County, who took her wounded husband's place at the cannon in the Battle of Monmouth, or Betsy Ross, of Philadelphia, who made the first starry banner, or Stephen Decatur, greatest of naval commanders, or Mad Anthony Wayne, hero of scores of battles. Their places and that of all the others are secure in American history and their deeds are imperishable.

Now, in this new crisis, when Americans are facing death in a conflict which may mean a long and bloody war, it is not surprising that a Pennsylvania boy was in the forefront of the first struggle, and his name heads the list of the first sacrifices. Pennsylvania has the same devotion to the flag as of old, and no partisan feeling or difference of opinion as to policy will weigh for a moment when the honor of the Nation and the safety of American citizens are at stake. President Wilson need but indicate his desire for the help of Pennsylvanians and the response will be as prompt and ready as in other days. There is but one feeling and that a desire to stand behind him, as he represents the Nation and the flag. Now that the die is cast, Pennsylvania stands at attention and asks the desire of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

CONFERENCE REPORT—ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 13453, the Army appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the conference report on the Army appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 556).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 5, 13, 14, 20, 28, 29, 30, 31, 64, 65, 66, 90, 103, 105, 107, 108, 143, 144, 145, 153, 154, 155, 157, 158, 162, 163, and 165.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 16, 17, 19, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 88, 89, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 99, 100, 101, 102, 104, 106, 110, 111, 112, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 122, 125, 126, 128, 129, 130, 132, 133, 135, 136, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 146, 147, 148, 150, 151, 152, 156, and 160, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following:

"Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system: For defraying the cost of such extensions and betterments of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system as may be approved by the Secretary of War, to be available until the close of the fiscal year 1915, from the receipts of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system which have been covered into the Treasury of the United States, the extent of such extensions and betterments and the cost thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of War, $50,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the language stricken out by said amendment; in line 9 of said amendment omit the word "hereafter," and on page 6, line 24 of the bill, strike out the word "hereafter"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 76: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: "Provided, That hereafter whenever the number of officers holding permanent appointments in any staff corps or staff department of the Army, except the Quartermaster Corps, shall have been reduced below four and a vacancy shall occur in an office above the grade of colonel in said corps or department, any officer of the Army with rank above that of major who shall have served creditably for not less than four years by detail in said corps or department under the provisions of section 26 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, shall, in addition to officers otherwise eligible, be eligible for appointment to fill said vacancy: Provided further, That hereafter whenever the President shall deem it inadvisable to reappoint, at the end of a four-year term, any officer who, under the provisions of section 26 of the act approved February 2, 1901, or acts amendatory thereof, has been appointed for such a term, in any staff corps or staff department, to an office with rank above that of colonel, but whose commission in the lower grade held by him in said staff corps or staff department at the time of his appointment under said act to an office of higher grade has been vacated, the President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said officer to be an officer of the grade that he would have held, and to occupy the relative position that he would have occupied, in said staff corps or staff department if he had not been appointed to said office with rank above that of colonel; and if under the operation of this proviso the number of officers of any particular grade in any staff corps or staff department shall at any time exceed the number authorized by law other than this act, no vacancy occurring in said grade shall be filled until after the total number of officers therein shall have been reduced below the number so authorized: And provided further, That after September 1, 1914, in time of peace, whenever any officer holding a permanent commission in the line of the Army, with rank of colonel, lieutenant colonel, or major, shall not have been actually present for duty for at least two years of the last preceding six years with a command composed of not less than two troops, batteries, or companies of that branch of the Army in which he shall hold said commission, such officer shall not be detached nor permitted to remain detached from such command for duty of any kind except as hereinafter specifically provided; and all pay and allowances shall be forfeited by any superior for any period during which, by his order or his permission, or by reason of his failure or neglect to issue or cause to be issued the proper order or instructions at the proper time, any officer shall be detached or permitted to remain detached in violation of any of the terms of this act; but nothing in this act shall be held to apply in the case of any officer for such period as shall be actually necessary for him, after having been relieved from detached service, to join the organization or command to which he shall belong in that branch in which he shall hold a permanent commission; nor shall anything in this act be held to apply to the detachment or detail of officers for duty in connection with the construction of the Panama Canal until after such canal shall have been formally opened, or in connection with the Alaska Road Commission or the Alaska Railroad or the Bureau of Insular Affairs; and nothing in this act shall prevent the redetail of officers above the grade of major to fill vacancies in the various staff corps and departments as provided for by section 26 of the act of Congress approved February 2, 1901: Provided further, That whenever the service record of any field officer is to be ascertained for the purposes of this act, all duty actually performed by him during the last preceding six years, in a grade below that of major, in connection with any statutory organization of that branch of the Army in which he shall hold a permanent commission, or as a staff officer of any coast-defense or coast-artillery district, shall be credited to him as actual presence for duty with a command composed as hereinbefore prescribed: And provided further, That temporary duty of any kind hereafter performed with United States troops in the field for a period or periods the aggregate of which shall not exceed 60 days in any one calendar year, and duty hereafter performed in command of United States Army mine planter by an officer assigned to a company from which this detachment is drawn, and duty hereafter performed in command of a machine-gun platoon or a machine-gun unit, by any officer who, before assignment to such duty, shall have been regularly assigned to, and shall have entered upon duty with, an organization or a command the detachment of certain officers from which is prohibited by the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912, or by this act, shall, for the purposes of said acts, hereafter be counted as actual presence for duty with such organization or command."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 87: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 87, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended paragraph insert the following:

"For expenses of courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, and compensation of reporters and witnesses attending the same, and expenses of taking depositions and securing other evidence for use before the same, $40,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 109: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 109, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the amended paragraphs; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 124: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment and add the following: "or horse races; but nothing in this proviso shall be held to apply to the officers, enlisted men, and horses of any troop, battery, or company which shall, by order or permission of the Secretary of War, and within the limits of the United States, attend any horse show or any State, county, or municipal fair, celebration, or exhibition"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 131: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 131, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$485,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 134: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 134, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: ": Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to allow and credit in the accounts of First Lieut. Robert L. Weeks, United States Army, the sum of $1,340, disallowed against him on the books of the Treasury in accordance with a ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury dated March 14, 1913; and that hereafter any officer of the Army and member of said Board of Road Commissioners who is living with his family while serving as a member of said board within the limits of the Territory of Alaska, and not stationed at a military post, shall be entitled to receive a per diem commutation fixed by the board in lieu of 'actual living expenses,' as now provided by law; and this provision shall embrace the time during which any member of said board shall have failed in the past to receive any allowance for expense of living by reason of the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury above referred to, to the effect that said allowance could not be made to an officer living with his family"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 149: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 149, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the words inserted by said amendment, and on page 43, line 4, of the bill strike out the words "and materials therefor"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 159: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 159, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: "$450,000: Provided, That existing written agreements involving the purchase of patented articles, patents for which have not expired, may be carried out"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On the amendments of the Senate numbered 24, 113, 121, 123, 137, 161, and 164 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

JAMES HAY,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.
GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
LUKE LEA,
H. A. DU PONT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

A statement on the part of the managers of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915:

Senate amendments 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 89, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 97, 99, 100, 101, 102, 104, 106, 112, 114, 116, 117, 118, 119, 122, 125, 126, 128, 132, 135, 136, 138, 142, 146, 150, 151, 152, 156, 160 are amendments changing language and punctuation which do not involve increases in appropriations, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 1 restores to the bill the $25 per month compensation to chief clerk of War College, which went out on a point of order, and the House recedes.

Senate amendments 2, 3, 4, and 5 changed the language of the item for contingencies, military information section, General Staff Corps, and increased the appropriation by $2,500; the Senate receded from 2, 3, and 5 and the House receded with an amendment on 4 making the amount $11,000 instead of $12,500.

Senate amendment 9 inserted the words "stationery, ice, and potable water for office use when necessary," and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 10 inserted the words "payment for which may be made in advance," referring to professional and technical newspapers and periodicals, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 13 increased the item for the Signal Service of the Army $50,000, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 14 provided that $300,000 instead of $250,000 be used for purchase of aeroplanes, etc., and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 15 makes immediately available $50,000 for purchase of aeroplanes, etc., and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 16 provides that property returns of the Signal Corps shall be rendered semiannually or more often, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 17 provides that all moneys arising from the disposition of Signal Corps supplies and equipment shall constitute one fund and be available during the fiscal year following for the replacement of supplies and equipment, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 18 provides for defraying the cost of the Washington-Alaska military cable and telegraph system and appropriates $135,000 therefor, and the House recedes with an amendment providing for $50,000, the same amount which was appropriated for this purpose last year.

Senate amendment 19 provides for signaling equipment for coast-defense posts and appropriates $12,000 therefor, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 20 raises the appropriation for pay of officers of the line $89,100, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 27 provides for the suspension of a sentence of dishonorable discharge, and that the authorized strength of the Army shall be exclusive of soldiers under sentence of confinement and dishonorable discharge, and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the word "hereafter" in line 1, page 9, and the same word on line 24 of page 9.

Senate amendment 28 increases the appropriation for Corps of Engineers by $15,312, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 29 increases the appropriation for the Ordnance Department by $4,536, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 30 increases the number of master signal electricians by one, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 31 increases the appropriation $900, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 38 increases the appropriation for the Hospital Corps by $47,288, and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the increase by $22,288.

Senate amendments 40, 41, 42, and 43 relate to the pay of clerks, messengers, and laborers at headquarters of territorial departments, districts, etc., and, together with Senate amendment 44, reduce the number and pay of these clerks, etc., and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 45 provides for additional pay of these employees while on foreign services $9,000, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 46 provides that on and after July 1, 1914, the pay of clerks and messengers at these headquarters, who are citizens of the United States, shall be increased 20 per cent while serving in the Philippine Islands, and that Filipino clerks may be employed at not to exceed $500 per annum, and the House recedes with an amendment which provides that the increase shall be $200 each per annum, and that Filipino clerks may be employed only in cases of vacancies.

Senate amendments 64 and 65 appropriate a lump sum for dental surgeons in place of the number provided for in the House provision, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 66 appropriates a lump sum for contract surgeons in place of the number provided for in the House provision, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 76 provides for the appointment of heads of staff corps and departments and enlarges the power of the President, giving him a wider field for selection; this amendment also provides for a change in what is known as the detached service or manchu law, and the House recedes with an amendment which provides when the number of officers holding permanent appointments in any staff corps or department of the Army shall have been reduced below four, and a vacancy occurs in the office in the corps above that of colonel, any officer of the Army with rank above that of major who shall have served creditably for not less than four years by detail in said corps under the provisions of the act of February 2, 1901, shall be eligible for appointment to fill such vacancy; and with regard to the provisions of said amendment dealing with detached service it is provided that the detached-service law of 1912 be extended to field officers.

Senate amendment 77 strikes out the provision in the bill providing that hereafter any retired officer of the Army shall not receive any part of the appropriation for retired officers who shall act as agent or employee of any firm, company, corporation, or individual engaged in manufacturing for or selling to the Government any article or articles either directly or indirectly, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 87 inserts the words "and expenses of taking depositions and securing other evidence for use before" courts-martial, and the House recedes with an amendment restoring the word "attending" struck out by the Senate and inserting after that the words "the same."

Senate amendment 88 reduces the amount to be paid the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds at Washington, D. C., from $1,000 to $500, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 90 provides for an increase of $50,000 in the appropriation for commutation of quarters, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 98 provides for an increase of $36,000 for pay to officers required to be mounted and who furnish their own mounts, and the House recedes with an amendment which cuts down the increase allowed by the Senate $11,000.

Senate amendment 103 increases the item for pay of the officers of the Porto Rico regiment $44,600, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 105 increases the item for such officers for length of service by $11,690, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 107 increases the pay of enlisted men of this regiment by $59,580, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 108 increases the amount of pay for length of service of such men by $5,000, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 109 provides for making the Porto Rico regiment a full regiment of Infantry, and the House recedes with an amendment striking out both the Senate and House provisions.

Senate amendment 110 provides for the expenditure of $25,000 out of the appropriation for encampment and maneuvers, Organized Militia, for the improvement either of the Tullahoma or Anniston maneuver grounds, as the Secretary of War may direct, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 111 strikes out the House provision making it necessary to submit estimates to Congress as to the expenditure of money for the Organized Militia, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 115 provides that the officers and enlisted men of the Army shall be permitted to purchase subsistence supplies from the Navy and Marine Corps at the same price as is charged to the officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 120 provides for the purchase and issue of instruments, etc., to the officers' schools, but does not increase the appropriation, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 124 strikes out the House provision that no part of any appropriation shall be expended for horse shows, and the House recedes with an amendment which restores the language of the House bill and adds the following: "or horse races, but nothing in this proviso shall be held to apply to the officers, enlisted men, and horses of any troop, battery, or company which shall, by order or permission of the Secretary of War and within the limits of the United States, attend any horse show or any State, county, or municipal fair, celebration, or exhibition."

Senate amendments 126 and 128 transpose the amount appropriated from one part of the paragraph to another, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 127 provides that $6,000 of the appropriation for barracks and quarters be expended for the construction of a rostrum in the Presidio of San Francisco and that $60,000 be appropriated for a library building at Fort Leavenworth, and the House recedes with an amendment providing that $60,000 for the library building shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be expended out of the sum appropriated for barracks and quarters.

Senate amendment 129 provides that private mounts of officers in excess of the authorized mounts may be shipped on Government bill of lading, and this amendment also provides that $75,000 of the appropriation for the transportation of the Army shall be available for additional pay to employees on harbor boats in lieu of subsistence, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 130 increases the appropriation for the transportation of the Army and its supplies by $100,000, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 131 increases the appropriation for roads, walks, wharves, and drainage by $20,000, and the House recedes with an amendment which reduces the increase by $10,000.

Senate amendment 133 inserts the words "construction and repair" before the word "maintenance," and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 134 provides for the modification of the organization of the Alaska Road Board and authorizes it to expend other moneys besides the sum appropriated in this bill, and authorizes the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and credit in the accounts of First Lieut. Robert L. Weeks $1,340 disallowed against him, and also fixes hereafter the allowances for an officer living with his family while serving as a member of said board in Alaska, and the House recedes with an amendment striking out all of the amendment of the Senate referring to the reorganization of the board and the expenditure of any money except that appropriated in this bill.

Senate amendments 135 and 136 transpose the amount appropriated from one part of the paragraph to another, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 139 strikes out $3,600 for rent of quartermaster storehouse, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 140 reduces the total for rent of quarters for officers, etc., by $3,600, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 141 increases the amount for claims for damages to and loss of private property by $1,437.34, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 143 inserts the words "printing and binding" in the item for medical and hospital department, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 144 increases the appropriation for the medical and hospital department by $50,000, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 145 provides for the removal of the Surgeon General's library to the Library of Congress, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 147 provides for the settlement of accounts between the Engineer Department and other departments and bureaus of the Government, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 148 increases the appropriation for ordnance service, $50,000, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 149 provides for the purchase of material for small-arms ammunition, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 153 transposes the amount appropriated to the middle of the paragraph, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 154 increases the appropriation for small-arms ammunition $75,000, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 155 inserts the words "and purchase of materials therefor" $750,000 in the item for manufacture of ammunition, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 157 transposes the amount appropriated from one part of the paragraph to another, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 158 inserts the words "and purchase of materials therefor" in the item of manufacture of arms, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 159 increases the appropriation for manufacture of arms by $50,000, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendments 162 and 163 insert the words "and the purchase of materials therefor" in the items of ammunition for field artillery and for field artillery, Organized Militia, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 165 provides for the purchase and erection of a monument on the grave of Gen. Henry W. Lawton, and the Senate recedes.

On the amendments of the Senate 24, 113, 121, 123, 137, 161, and 164 the committee on conference has been unable to agree.

Senate amendment 24 increases the amount of pay of enlisted men by $1,221,762.

Senate amendment 113 increases the amount for subsistence of the Army by $662,475.

Senate amendment 121 increases the amount for regular supplies by $455,000.

Senate amendment 123 increases the amount for horses for Cavalry, etc., by $65,285.

Senate amendment 137 increases the amount for clothing, camp and garrison equipage, by $800,000.

Senate amendment 161 increases the amount for field artillery, Organized Militia, by $1,350,000.

Senate amendment 164 increases the amount for ammunition for field artillery $2,000,000.

These seven items aggregate $6,554,522, the amount in disagreement between the two Houses.

The Senate receded from amounts aggregating $709,006.

The House receded from amounts aggregating $223,437.34.

JAMES HAY.
S. H. DENT, Jr.
JULIUS KAHN.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. I will; yes.

Mr. MANN. I did not know the conference report was coming up to-day until recently. What was done with the amendment with reference to moving the Surgeon General's library?

Mr. HAY. The Senate receded.

Mr. MANN. What was done in reference to the amendment in regard to the Alaskan cable?

Mr. HAY. The amount of $50,000 was appropriated, the same as last year.

Mr. MANN. The Senate added an item of $135,000.

Mr. HAY. They receded from $85,000, and $50,000 was appropriated.

Mr. MANN. That is the same as in the current law.

Mr. HAY. That is the same as in the current law.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman ever yet been able to ascertain what it cost to maintain the Alaskan cable?

Mr. HAY. I have not, but I have been able to ascertain it will cost much more to maintain it than we will receive from it.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course——

Mr. HAY. I mean by that that we will pay out more than we will receive in payment for the use which is made of it by the public.

Mr. MANN. Of course there is not charged to the Alaska cable the cost of its operation; a very large share of the cost of maintenance is charged to the Regular Army.

Mr. HAY. Yes; that is true, of course, but we have to pay the money and it does not make any difference where it is charged.

Mr. MANN. I know we have to pay the money, and the fact it is not charged there makes it much more difficult to ascertain how much that is. I do not think anybody has ever been able to discover what the expense of maintenance and operation of the Alaskan cable is. Of course we know the signal office has discovered enough to know that they want to get rid of it, because it is very uncomfortable for them to maintain it where it costs so much money.

Mr. HAY. A very great burden upon them, and I do not blame them, when, as a matter of fact, it is mostly used by the public and not by the Army.

Mr. MANN. Why is it not just as much needed for the benefit of the Army now as it was when it was put there?

Mr. HAY. I suppose there is just as much need.

Mr. MANN. I will say frankly the signal-service office says there is no need of it now for the Army. I do not see any great difference myself between when it was put there and now.

Mr. HAY. There is no great difference, but the reason why it was put there by the Army was because they saw a way by which they could get the means to put it there. The reason given was that we had forts in Alaska.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman; the reasons given for putting it there, however, were quite different. The reasons given were that we had troops up there and we had to have a cable so as to have close connection with them.

Mr. HAY. I may say to the gentleman the War Department this year tried to get the Post Office Department to take this cable over, and made no estimate for that item. The Post Office Department would not take the cable over, so when the Army bill went to the Senate they sent up a supplemental estimate and the Senate put in $135,000, and we agreed on $50,000.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know whether I am opposed to Government ownership or not. A great many things I think the Government ought to own, some I doubt the practicability of, but I advise all of those who are closely or fully committed to Government ownership to examine into the ownership of the Alaskan cable, which after it has been constructed and is in operation the War Department seeks to get rid of because it can not afford to maintain and operate it; and the Post Office Department does not want to take it, because it believes that it will be operated at a loss.

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield.

Mr. KAHN. As a matter of fact, the amount that was recommended by the department to the Senate was materially increased, because, as I understood it, they contemplated laying more cable. So, evidently the cables are needed in Alaska. The House bill had no provision whatever for this item when it went to the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe there is any place in the country where, if the people could get something constructed without expense to them, but at the expense of the Government, they would not ask to have the thing constructed if it was of any benefit to them at all?

Mr. KAHN. I rather guess any section of the country would be glad to have the Government lay cables or construct roads or anything that the Government might be inclined to construct; and yet the fact that the Signal Corps of the Army has asked for additional money to lay more cables would indicate to me that they wanted them for the Army.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I do not think they have asked for more money to construct an additional cable.

Mr. HAY. They asked for $496,000, a part of which was to be used in laying down a new cable, and then other items of expense which made up their whole estimate of $496,000.

Mr. MANN. I have the items here, and there is not anything in them, as I see it, in reference to the construction of new cable.

Mr. HAY. I can only say to the gentleman that the War Department sent me as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a statement including an item for the laying down of a new cable. Whether that has been printed or not I do not know.

Mr. MANN. I have it right in my hand.

Mr. HAY. I do not think the item——

Mr. MANN. This was sent to the Committee on Appropriations. I think a similar one was sent to the gentleman's committee.

Mr. HAY. I do not know where it went. What I am talking about is the typewritten statement. I have never seen it in print. But the reason was that the old cable had worn out and would not last, and they wanted a new one.

Mr. MANN. I do not know. The items making up the $496,754.39—and I suppose that is very accurate—are as follows:

Cost of enlisted men, including all additional pay, clothing, and rations, $210,264.38; pay of six officers, $21,513.24; cost of Quartermaster Corps of transportation, supplies, and personnel, $56,976.77; cable ship Burnside, $105,000; salaries, rents, and incidentals, $54,258.21; supplies, $15,741.79; repairs on cable ship Burnside, $30,000; and commutation of quarters to officers and fuel and light, $3,000.

The total is the amount that I gave. Now, they ask for an appropriation, if I recall rightly, for that in order that it might not be charged to the regular appropriation. They do not know and do not pretend to know how much of this is really chargeable to the Alaskan cable, because it is not practicable to tell.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the conferees of the two Houses disagreed upon seven amendments, all of which amendments referred to increase of appropriations. One of them was as to the number of enlisted men to be provided for, another was for the subsistence of those enlisted men. One was for the supplies of the Army. One was for the clothing and camp and garrison equipage for the Army, and one was for horses—an increased appropriation for the purchase of horses. One was an increase of appropriation for the purchase of ammunition for field artillery and one was for the purchase of field artillery.

Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the fact that we are now practically in a state of war, I should have asked the House to insist upon the disagreement and to insist that we should not recede from the amendments of the Senate. But under the existing circumstances and conditions I propose to move to concur in the Senate amendments when the proper time comes to make that motion. And I take it that now is the proper time.

Mr. MANN. No. You have not disposed of the conference report.

Mr. HAY. As soon as the conference report is agreed to I will make the motion. And in the meantime, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference?

Mr. HAY. Six million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. On the seven items?

Mr. HAY. On the seven items.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky desire to address the House on the conference report or on these seven amendments?

Mr. SHERLEY. On the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, the conference report as agreed to by the conferees has a provision in it which prohibits the redetail of officers below the grade of lieutenant colonel, as I recall it.

Mr. HAY. For field officers.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes, for field officers. Now, I am heartily in favor of that provision in its general aspect, but I do not believe that it ought to apply to the Ordnance Department, because of the peculiar character of the work now being performed in that corps by officers below the grade of lieutenant colonel. The work of those officers is of a highly technical character. They are practically specialists in the supervising of the manufacture of matériel, the making of powder and ammunition, and the building of guns. It would very seriously cripple the work of that department if they were required to have a field service—if men of the grade of major were required to have a field service before they could be redetailed to their work in the Ordnance Department. But, appreciating that we are in a position to-day in the House where it is important that this bill should become a law, and believing that the defeat of the conference report would perhaps result in considerable delay in the final passage of the bill, I shall not now oppose an adoption of the report. It is my understanding, after talking with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], that a bill will be brought on the floor of the House shortly which will present this exception, which I think ought to be made in favor of the Ordnance Department; in other words, to permit the redetail of officers above the grade of captain, so as to include the redetail of majors as well as lieutenant colonels and those of a higher rank.

I simply felt that it was proper to make this statement so that it might not be considered that the action taken on the conference report now was to foreclose this matter.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I agree with what the gentleman says about the officers in the Ordnance Department. The chairman of the committee [Mr. HAY] called my attention to the attitude of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I agree with the chairman of the committee that a bill should be brought in to straighten out that matter.

Mr. SHERLEY. The only reason why I have taken occasion to say anything—because I am usually more than willing to follow the judgment of the gentleman from Virginia—is that as chairman of the subcommittee on fortifications I have had very intimate acquaintanceship with the work that is done by the Ordnance Department and the effect that this would have upon the efficiency of that corps. I do not desire to further delay the House, but I felt that it was proper that this statement should be made; and with the understanding I have stated, I shall not oppose the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, during the 10 years that I have been a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House I have always believed in proper expenditures for the maintenance of an adequate military force. I have never cared for it to be an unnecessarily large force, but I have always maintained that it should be an efficient force, and I think we can safely say that the Army of the United States to-day is better prepared for any possible emergency than it has been at any previous time in the history of the country. [Applause.] We have a greater reserve of clothing, medical stores, small arms, and ammunition than ever before. That is as it should be.

The large appropriations that have been asked for by the War Department for the coming fiscal year might have been cut very materially in a number of the items that were disagreed to by the House conferees and the taxpayers of the country could have been saved what we considered unnecessary expenditures. The Army has been increased during the past year. Under the law of 1901 the President has the right to recruit and enlist men in the Army to the number of a hundred thousand. Up to a year ago the number of men in the Army had been less than 80,000. As I now recall the number was 77,500. I believe that number to be sufficient in time of peace. But during the present administration that number has been increased to about 85,000 men. A deficiency estimate of appropriation quite recently has been sent to Congress aggregating about $3,500,000 to pay for the services of the additional men, their subsistence, their clothing, and their transportation.

Mr. Speaker, I have on a number of occasions criticized the present administration's policies. I believed and still believe the criticisms were justified. But I believe we have now reached a condition in the affairs of our country when I consider it a patriotic duty to vote for such appropriations as will enable the administration to carry out its program in regard to Mexico. Two hundred thousand dollars of the amount for Cavalry horses in this bill is made immediately available, and we have been told the War Department requires that money immediately for the purchase of necessary Cavalry horses. I therefore hope that this conference report will be adopted unanimously, in order that the administration and the War Department may be able to carry out their military plans.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the committee referred to the amendments that were disagreed to, but which he is going to move to agree to, as providing for an increase of the Army. Can the gentleman state the number of men that will be provided for if the amendment is adopted?

Mr. KAHN. The increase provided for in the present bill will take care of approximately 85,000 men.

Mr. HAY. Exclusive of the Philippine Scouts?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, of course; exclusive of Philippine Scouts.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Everybody wants to know what will be the procedure in case we get involved in more or less of a war—a real war—with Mexico, in regard to appropriations, and especially as related to the continuance of the session. I take it that the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, the able and accomplished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which has control of appropriations, has been consulted by the administration to the extent of having knowledge as to what is likely to be the procedure, whether they will come in and ask for additional appropriations?

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that I have not been consulted by the administration, because, as I understand, the administration has not yet concluded that there is going to be war.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the administration has concluded that there is a liability of war.

Mr. HAY. That may be.

Mr. MANN. I should suppose that the administration for some time past has figured that there was a possibility of war.

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. I think no other reason could be given for the increase in the Army unless it was because of the ease of getting men to enlist in these hard times.

Mr. HAY. There has been no trouble in getting men to enlist, but not on account of hard times.

Mr. MANN. There was trouble in getting them to enlist in good times.

Mr. HAY. There is no more now than at any other time. As to when the administration is going to declare war, I have no more information than has the gentleman. If what he wants to know is how many soldiers——

Mr. MANN. I mean, what will be the procedure? Of course, the making of the annual appropriations for the military establishment is done through the military appropriation bill. We make other appropriations through the Committee on Appropriations in the deficiency bill. What I would like to know is, if the gentleman can inform us, if occasion arises, will we appropriate the money at once or will we have to stay here?

Mr. HAY. I think we can appropriate it and we will not have to stay here, although I have not been consulted in any way about it. I take it that before the volunteers can be called out there will have to be a declaration of war. The President will have to be authorized by Congress to call out the volunteers. How many he will call out I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall what procedure we adopted in 1898?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The $50,000,000 appropriation had nothing to do with this.

Mr. HAY. No; the Committee on Military Affairs made all the appropriations for the Army proper—for the Volunteers, Regulars, supplies, subsistence, camp equipage, and horses, and all the various things that go to make up the needs of the Army. My recollection is that we made the appropriations and adjourned very soon thereafter. We adjourned in July, as I remember.

Mr. MANN. Yes; we adjourned in the first part of July.

Mr. HAY. We made all the necessary appropriations for the troops in the Philippines, which had then been acquired, and for all the other troops then in the field for the balance of that fiscal year, and adjourned. I do not take it that it would be necessary for us to remain here, if we do have war, and make appropriations by piecemeal, because I presume the President would call out troops enough to meet the situation. I think, as a matter of fact, the War College has worked out a plan and knows how many men it will require to take care of the situation if war should be determined upon.

Mr. MANN. They may have to learn it by experience.

Mr. HAY. Yes; but I think they have worked out a plan.

Mr. KAHN. Let me say that as far as volunteers are concerned there is a bill now pending for volunteers.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if in case Mexico declares war against the United States a declaration of war by Congress would be necessary?

Mr. HAY. I think so. Spain declared war against the United States first.

Mr. STAFFORD. As to the increase suggested by the Senate and approved of by the chairman of the committee, were those recommendations submitted to the committee when the House was in consideration of the bill providing for an increase of a standing Army to 85,000 men?

Mr. HAY. The estimate was for 85,000 men; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And there has been no provision arranged for in expectation of difficulties in Mexico?

Mr. HAY. No increase over the estimates made by the War Department.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Amendment 27 remains in the bill?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, it provides where a court-martial has taken place and a sentence of confinement has been passed, the guilty man may be paroled and may go back to his command. Does this provide that if he is sentenced for two years in confinement he must serve those extra two years and then the time remaining of enlistment in order to receive an honorable discharge?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. So that all this does is to permit the man to receive an honorable discharge by serving such time with the company instead of having a dishonorable discharge?

Mr. HAY. Yes. It is for the purpose of rehabilitating a man who has been charged with desertion and has been found guilty.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman think this ought to go a little further and that, notwithstanding a great many of these offenses, he might be placed back in the Army?

Mr. HAY. He may be.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand—and serve his time to the end of his enlistment without having to serve additional time?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman will observe that we have provided that this be tried for only one year.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HAY. We did that for the purpose of seeing how it is going to work; and if it works as the War Department thinks it will, it will be made permanent law; but if it does not, it may be modified.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am very much in favor of that provision, because I think it is a splendid thing that there should be a parole instead of putting these young men in prison and dishonorably discharging them, and I want to compliment the committee for agreeing to such a provision.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I now move to concur in the seven Senate amendments to which the conferees have not yet agreed. The Clerk has the numbers.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report them, one at a time.

Senate amendment No. 24: Page 6, line 15, strike out the figures "$16,949,126" and insert the figures "$18,170,884."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if I understand the statement correctly, these amendments involve about six and a half million dollars?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And it is the gentleman's purpose to move to concur in all of them?

Mr. HAY. In all of them; for the reason that we are now in a condition almost of war, and if this money is not appropriated upon this bill, it will have to be appropriated on some other bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand. What I wish to obtain some information about, if the gentleman will permit, is this: The amounts involved in these amendments would have provided for an army of 85,000 men?

Mr. HAY. Exclusive of the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the Army at present?

Mr. HAY. At present it is about 85,000 men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was it when the appropriations for the current year were made?

Mr. HAY. The department estimated for the current year for 77,500 men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is since the 1st of last July?

Mr. HAY. Yes. The department estimated for this current year for 77,500 men, and I will say that the House and Senate gave the department every dollar it asked for. We did not cut the pay of the Army below the estimates. But before the fiscal year began, as I understand it, the President issued an order increasing the Army, and in the last three months the Army has been increased up to 85,000 men, which has resulted in a deficiency of about $2,000,000 for pay and subsistence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman means in the last six months?

Mr. HAY. In this current year; yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These appropriations will provide for 85,000 men in the Regular Army?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course in our present condition the situation is such that no one can tell what will be required, but was it the purpose to increase the Regular Army permanently over what it had been during the last year of the Republican administration?

Mr. HAY. I do not know what the purpose was, but the order was issued.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield——

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been some discussion as to whether we should not recruit the Regular Army nearer to the 100,000 limitation because of the number of men which were supposed to be desirable to have outside of what we refer to as continental United States.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman that when the Secretary of War came before the Committee on Military Affairs to explain the bill which is now under consideration he stated that it was necessary to have 85,000 men, and upon being questioned he stated how many men he wanted to put in Panama, how many in Honolulu, and how many in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was on a peace basis.

Mr. HAY. That was on a peace basis. That accounted for 35,000 men, and the committee thought that if they put those 35,000 men on those stations abroad, that with 77,500 men that would leave 42,000 men for the United States, and we thought that was sufficient, and therefore we cut down the estimate made by the Secretary from 85,000 to 77,500, the same as was made for the last year, and the Senate put up the appropriation to meet the estimate made by the Secretary of War; and when we had this conference on this bill we were not then advised of the fact that we were going to a war with Mexico, and we refused to agree to the Senate amendment, and I was strongly of the opinion, and am now, that there should be a provision put into this appropriation bill saying that only the amount of money appropriated by the bill should be spent for the men that we provided for and no more. And we have a precedent for that. Before the Spanish War the authorized strength of the Army was 30,000 men, but the Army bill always carried a provision that not more than 25,000 men should be paid out of the money provided.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Practically a limitation upon the appropriation?

Mr. HAY. A limitation upon the appropriation; and in time of peace I should be in favor of that now, so as to avoid increasing the Army beyond what is actually needed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has come within a short time certain urgent deficiencies estimated for the Army, aggregating, I think, three and one-half million dollars, some of it due to present conditions in Mexico, some of it due to increase in number of enlisted men in the Army. What I was seeking to have was the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia and of his committee as to whether it was believed to be necessary, in case these difficulties pass over, that the enlisted strength of the Army should be maintained at 85,000 men. That will add, it is said, about $8,000,000, but it will probably cost about $10,000,000 annually for the additional 8,000 men.

Mr. HAY. As I understand the position of the War Department, it is that they consider these men necessary. That is their contention.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course the War Department, in my experience and the experience of the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from California, regardless of politics, is interested in having the largest possible military establishment, because the larger the establishment the greater the opportunities for the officers, and Congress has always had a restraining hand upon that natural enthusiasm and interest of the professional military man.

Mr. HAY. And that was the reason why the Committee on Military Affairs cut down the appropriation to what they did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much will this bill carry over the current law if these amendments are concurred in?

Mr. HAY. It would carry about $7,000,000 over the current law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Making——

Mr. HAY. One hundred and one million dollars and some hundred thousand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to express the opinion that so far as he and his committee are concerned it is not believed that under ordinary circumstances it is necessary to expend annually that much money for the maintenance of the Army?

Mr. HAY. That is my opinion; yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield five minutes to me?

Mr. HAY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether I will occupy that much time or not.

Mr. Speaker, the item under consideration is the item providing for pay of enlisted men of all grades, including recruits. The House passed the item with an appropriation of $16,949,126. The Senate increased the amount to $18,170,884, and this bill passed the Senate last month.

Mr. HAY. Passed the House last month?

Mr. MANN. Passed the Senate last month. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], whom I regard as a very able chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, informs us that he now moves to concur in the Senate amendments because of the situation that has occurred in the last few days. But the situation that had occurred a month ago caused the Senate to increase this amount to the amount that it is now proposed to agree to, and that amount only paid for the men now enlisted in the Army. No increase over the number that were then in the Army and are now in the Army. If the gentleman from Virginia had insisted upon reducing the amount provided by the Senate amendment, he would have insisted upon appropriating a less amount than would be sufficient to pay for the men now enlisted in the Army and a month ago in the Army.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman permit me? The gentleman does not seem to understand.

Mr. MANN. Do not tell me that. I do understand. Will the gentleman make his point?

Mr. HAY. I say you do not seem to understand that men go out of the Army every day.

Mr. MANN. Of course I know that.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is misleading the House.

Mr. MANN. I am not misleading the House.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman states that we were not willing to appropriate for men who are now in the Army. Now, if we appropriated, say, for 77,500 men for the next current year, the Army could be reduced from its present number of 85,000 by stopping recruiting for one month. That would do it. And every man that is in the Army now would be paid according to his contract.

Mr. MANN. The answer which the gentleman from Virginia makes is entirely fallacious. We appropriated last year for this number of men in the Army, about 77,000 of them. They have increased the number to 85,000, without any appropriation.

Mr. HAY. But that is no answer to what I said.

Mr. MANN. Yes; it is.

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. MANN. And they were paid for, too.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman does not understand the proposition.

Mr. MANN. I understand it better than the gentleman does.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman thinks he understands every proposition better than anybody else does.

Mr. MANN. When some cheap fellow gets up in the House that is always the answer he makes to me. I am used to that. I did not say anything about what the gentleman was willing or unwilling to appropriate. I said, and I say now, the appropriation which the gentleman proposed to make would not have provided the pay for the Army as it stands, and as it stood a month ago. The Army has been increased to 85,000, whereas the current appropriation only contemplated an Army of 77,000 men. The gentleman gives an excuse, which is probably a valid one, that he proposes to take the Senate amendment on account of conditions arising during the last few days. But the conditions which caused the Senate to increase the amount were in existence when the Senate increased the amount. The Army had been increased to 85,000, and one of two conclusions is inevitable—either that the sum proposed by the House for the next year would have been too small or else the Secretary of War was not already warranted in increasing the Army by seven or eight thousand without receiving any appropriation by Congress. He had the appropriation of last year. He increased the Army. I am not endeavoring to criticize him. I have no desire to criticize the Committee on Military Affairs, but there is the situation. The President had the power to increase the Army, and he increased the Army to 85,000.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? I can throw a little light on the proposition so far as the matter before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is concerned. Gen. Aleshire, when he was before the committee, stated that the appropriation they were asking for was for 80,117 men. That is practically the amount that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House allowed. They did not ask for 85,000 men before the House Committee on Military Affairs. The figures stated by Gen. Aleshire were 80,117 men.

Mr. MANN. At what time was Gen. Aleshire before the committee?

Mr. KAHN. We started on our hearings in December.

Mr. MANN. But between December and the time the bill passed the Senate and the time they appeared before the Senate committee the Army has been increased to about 85,000 men. I have no desire to criticize the increase. I rather think the situation warranted an increase, and I think also that everything that has warranted an increase has not occurred within the last three days nor since the trouble arose at Tampico.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to put myself straight with the House. I think I know something about the Army.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the statement that if the Army has been increased to 85,000 during the present current year, if we do not appropriate the amount that was estimated for by the War Department and the amount that was appropriated by the Senate, we will not have money enough for the Army next year, and that the House in cutting down the estimate of the War Department did not provide money enough for the Army as it now is. Mr. Speaker, that statement is misleading.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I did not make the first part of that statement. I made the last part.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman did not make the first part of that statement, he made something very similar to it. I so understood it.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is the way the gentleman confused the situation a while ago.

Mr. HAY. I will be glad to have the gentleman state it.

Mr. MANN. What I stated was that the appropriation made by the House would not be sufficient to provide for the Army as it now is.

Mr. HAY. That is just what I tried to say.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not deny that.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman says that the appropriation provided by the House would not pay and maintain the Army as it now is for the next fiscal year. I thought I stated that, and that is what I understood the gentleman to say.

That is true; and we did not desire to make an appropriation for an army of 85,000 men, which they now have. Our purpose was to appropriate for an army of 77,500 men, and in doing that we would not have interfered in any wise with the contract of any soldier who is now in the Army, because the terms of enlistment of men in the Army terminate every day, every week, every month, and by stopping recruiting for 30 days before the beginning of the fiscal year the Army would be reduced to 77,500 men, and the money which was provided for in the House bill would have been amply sufficient to pay for the 77,500 men who ought to be in the Army during the next fiscal year.

I have no criticism to make of the administration or of the Secretary of War for increasing the Army. It is a right which the President has. But I do maintain that the legislative branch of this Government has always exercised the right to hold the purse strings, and particularly to hold them over appropriations for the Army; and it ought to be shown beyond peradventure in times of peace that the number of men which are estimated for by the War Department are absolutely necessary for the uses and necessities of the country, and we ought not to appropriate any more money than is necessary. And the Committee on Military Affairs, in acting upon these estimates sent to us by the War Department, acted upon that assumption, that we were appropriating for an army on a peace basis, and that 77,500 men were ample for all the uses and necessities of this country during a time of peace.

Now we are confronted with a different condition of affairs, and I do not believe it would be the part of wisdom or the part of patriotism for us to haggle about appropriations for the necessary number of men in the condition which now confronts us.

Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I move to concur in all the Senate amendments in one motion. I ask unanimous consent to move to concur in all the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to move to concur in all the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. I think we should have the numbers of those amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the numbers of the amendments.

Senate amendments 24, 113, 121, 123, 137, 161, 164.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I notice in one amendment just read there is no number—the fourth one, as to the increase in the amount of cavalry.

The SPEAKER. That is number 123, which the Clerk read among the others.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Speaker, in looking over the hearings before the committee, I find some information that may refresh the memory of the gentleman from Virginia. As I understand it, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, appropriations were made for 77,500 enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. HAY. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. AVIS. At the time of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs in January the number of enlisted men in the Army was 80,117. In that connection, I might refresh the recollection of some gentlemen by calling attention to the fact that General Orders, War Department, March 30, 1912, and its subsequent modifications by direction of the Secretary of War, provided for an authorized strength of 89,566 enlisted men, including the Military Academy, but excluding the Hospital Corps, Philippine Scouts, Quartermaster Corps, and that the Secretary of War asked for an appropriation based on an estimate of 85,000 enlisted men anticipated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; that the amendment we now ask the House to concur in is based on the estimate made by the Secretary of War for 85,000 men, which is a less number than that provided for by the general orders of March 30, 1912.

Mr. HAY. I now yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the matter that has just been brought out is of vital importance to this House and the Congress. The Army during the past year has been increased by a considerable number of men, and, so far as I have been able to learn, not a single member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House or of the Senate was consulted in regard to the matter. The Congress must furnish the money to pay these men. The wisdom of or the necessity for the increase I do not desire to discuss at this time. The President has the right to recruit the Army to the full extent of 100,000 men, but it is Congress that must furnish the money to pay and equip them. I fully agree with the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. HAY] that Congress should still hold its hands on the purse strings of the Nation. But I am convinced that it is our patriotic duty to vote for the increased amounts contained in the Senate amendments, in view of the situation regarding Mexico, and I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia will prevail.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. I move to concur in all the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

VOLUNTEER FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KAHN.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4980. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1914.

ADJOURNMENT.

And then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 23, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 23, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the sad and tragic scenes of life have always driven us nearer to Thy side. In the midst of storm and stress we have found more need of God than we have realized, at least, in the joy and sunshine. We come to Thee to-day and lift our hearts for Thy blessing. We remember that there are those lying dead who have represented us, and others torn with bullets are suffering because of their devotion to their country and their obedience to the order and law of their land. We pray that they may realize our sympathy and care; that they may have the Divine favor. We pray that Thy favor and blessing may be vouchsafed to all in command and all in authority in this land; and that the time may come speedily when Mexico will again enjoy prosperity and order, when we shall have the blessing of peace. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HARBOR TONNAGE AND CONSTRUCTION OF LOCKS (S. DOC. NO. 470).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in partial response to a resolution of the 9th instant, a tabulated statement of the number of locks the Government has constructed, the location and cost of each, the number of men employed in operation during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13453) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 24, 113, 121, 123, 137, 161, and 164, and agrees to the same.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAY, Mr. DENT, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 4980) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1914, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

VOLUNTEER FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. DU PONT conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk a telegram in the nature of a petition, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., April 22, 1914.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Massachusetts Federation of Churches, believing that it speaks for the great body of the Christian people of Massachusetts, solemnly protests against a war with the Mexican people. Our churches believe that in whatever may be done in behalf of order in Mexico there should be no thought of aggression or selfish aggrandizement. They desire such policies as shall circumscribe to the utmost the exercise of force and shall advance the friendly and rational settlement of the present crisis. The United States, even under great provocation, must not forget its obligations as a leader in the sacred cause of international peace.

CHARLES F. RICE, President.
CHARLES CONKLIN, Secretary.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Worcester, Mass., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Aldermen of Somerville, Mass., and resolutions adopted by the Board of Selectmen of Winthrop, Mass., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide for the retirement of superannuated civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. WORKS. I have received a number of telegrams from citizens of my State in the nature of petitions relative to the appropriation for the enforcement of the Federal migratory-bird law. I ask that the telegrams may be printed in the RECORD without reading and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 22, 1914.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Federal bird law approved last October immense benefit to California already. Its strict enforcement by Federal officers only salvation. Our migratory game menaced by local destructive forces. We appreciate present emergency, but recommend appropriation of at least $100,000.

CALIFORNIA FISH AND GAME COMMISSION.
LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 22, 1914.

Senator J. D. WORKS,
Washington, D. C.:

Will you not use your influence to secure a $100,000 appropriation for the enforcement of the Federal migratory-bird bill? Without this money that splendid provision for the birds will become useless.

Mrs. E. H. HUSHER,
President Los Angeles Audubon Society.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 22, 1914.

Senator JOHN D. WORKS,
Washington, D. C.:

Will you not use your influence to secure a $100,000 appropriation for the enforcement of the Federal migratory-bird bill? Without this money that splendid provision for the birds will become useless.

Mrs. FRANCES H. WELDON,
Humane Commissioner, Los Angeles.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 22, 1914.

Senator JOHN D. WORKS,
Washington, D. C.:

Please work for a $100,000 appropriation for the enforcement of the Federal migratory-bird bill. This appropriation is very necessary.

Mrs. C. W. FOOTE,
5337 Montevista Street.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 22, 1914.

Senator JOHN D. WORKS,
Washington, D. C.:

Please work for a $100,000 appropriation for the enforcement of the Federal migratory-bird bill. This appropriation is very necessary.

Mrs. F. E. BICKNELL,

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 22, 1914.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Federal migratory-bird law, the most important and effective step ever taken for bird protection in the interest of agriculture and horticulture, is in jeopardy through possible failure of appropriation necessary for its enforcement. Strongly urge your active support of minimum appropriation of $50,000 for purpose stated.

C. E. GRUNSKY,
President California Academy of Science.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., April 18, 1914.

Senator JOHN D. WORKS,
Washington, D. C.:

The California Audubon Society urges you to use your influence to secure a $100,000 appropriation to enforce the Federal migratory-bird bill. In our estimation this is most important.

HARRIETT WILLIAMS MYERS,
Secretary.

BERKELEY, CAL., April 21, 1914.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

California conservationists earnestly request $100,000 appropriation, enforcement Federal migratory-bird law. University of California says our game decreasing rapidly; 10 years will see extinction many species without enforcement Federal law. Measure popular in California; practically no opposition.

CALIFORNIA ASSOCIATED SOCIETIES FOR CONSERVATION,
WILLIAM S. BADE, President.
W. P. TAYLOR, Secretary.

Mr. WARREN. I have received numerous telegrams from members of certain societies and unions on the subject of troubles occasioned by strikes in mining districts. I ask that they may be severally noted and the signatures given and that they be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the telegrams were noted and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

Telegram in nature of petition of Subdistrict No. 1 of District No. 22, United Mine Workers of America, of Kirby, Wyo.;

Telegram in nature of a petition from Wyoming Weekly Labor Journal;

Telegram in nature of a petition from Local Union No. 2532, United Mine Workers of America, of Cambria, Wyo.;

Telegram in nature of a petition from Local Union No. 2700, United Mine Workers of America, of Crosby, Wyo.; and a Telegram in nature of a petition from Local Union No. 2742, United Mine Workers of America, of Carneyville, Wyo., all praying for Federal protection to striking miners and their families in Colorado.

Mr. WARREN. I also have certain telegrams and a letter from some of those who wish to participate in the defense of the country if their service is required. I ask that the letter and telegrams may be severally noted and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the letter and telegrams were noted and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

A letter from H. Donzelmann, of Cheyenne, Wyo.

A telegram from Lieut. Col. James Bulger, of Denver, Colo.

A telegram from George W. Jones, formerly of Wyoming, of Kearsarge, Cal., each offering his services to the country.

Mr. ASHURST. I have a large number of telegraphic dispatches from various persons offering their service to the country provided they can secure commissions as captains, majors, and colonels. I shall not read these telegrams into the RECORD, but, under the head of "Petitions and memorials," upon which we are proceeding, I desire to read some telegrams just received from citizens of Arizona relating to another interesting subject. These gentlemen represent the various political parties that are contending for supremacy in Arizona.

PHOENIX, ARIZ., April 22, 1914.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Stand fast for free tolls and Arizona friends and others irrespective of party will back you. Arizonans are realizing what a big detriment repeal will mean to the shippers and consumers of the State.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

I arrive in Washington Friday morning 7.30 with resolutions favoring free tolls from Maricopa County Commercial Club. Please arrange hearing for me before Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

F. A. JONES.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey presented memorials of sundry citizens of Passaic, Hoboken, Newark, Orange, Netcong, Stanhope, Dover, Jersey City, Paterson, Harrison, East Newark, Elizabeth, Nutley, Irvington, Roselle, Roselle Park, East Orange, Dunellen, Lincoln, Plainfield, South River, Phillipsburg, Cape May, and Mount Hope, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the passage of certain resolutions now before Congress providing national prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions from various organizations, churches, and sundry citizens of Princeton, Middlebush, Millstone, Bound Brook, East Millstone, Somerville, Mount Ephriam, Blackwood, Riverside, Glendora, Elmer, Plainfield, Dividing Creek, Bridgeton, Greenwich, Hackensack, Haddonfield, Westmont, East Side, Keyport, Essex, Irvington, Ocean City, Freehold, Roselle, Roselle Park, Mickleton, Monroeville, Pennsville, Oak Ridge, Smithville, Dover, Gladstone, Netcong, Stanhope, Flanders, Succasunna, Passaic, Paterson, Salem, Windsor, Merchantville, Vineland, Waldwick, Ridgewood, Hohokus, Wykoff, Jersey City, Manahawkin, Burlington, Shiloh, Hightstown, Bayonne, Almonesson, North Woodbury, Manasquan, Clinton, Hamden, Califon, Annandale, Three Bridges, Stanton, Pennsgrove, Pedricktown, Tuckerton, Cranford, Fairton, Westville, Newbold, South Bound Brook, Montclair, Long Branch, Arlington, Berlin, Columbus, Mount Holly, Matawan, Butler, Bloomingdale, and Flemington, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for national prohibition of the manufacture, importation, or sale of alcoholic beverages, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a telegraphic communication which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

DENISON, TEX., April 20, 1914.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Brotherhood Railroad Trainmen favors illiteracy test in immigration bill as passed by House and opposes amendment proposed by the railroads allowing Mexican laborers to come in, as such menace to workers here. Last year a million and a half aliens entered the country; that is more competition than we can endure. Urge your aid in this matter. Please present to Senate.

A. E. CRAWFORD,
Secretary Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen Lodge No. 15.

Mr. JONES. I note that there are quite a number of telegrams being filed in the Senate from persons desiring commissions in the Army in connection with the trouble with Mexico. I have received a good many telegrams of that character, but I simply want to put on record the statement that instead of filing them in the Senate I have filed them with the Secretary of War, who will probably have charge of matters of that kind.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he has received a request from people who desire to enlist as privates?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. I have received a number of applications asking to be given commissions of various kinds, but up to this time no one has telegraphed to me applying for the position of a common soldier.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not received any from my State to that effect.

Mr. JAMES. I ask the Senator if he believes the American people have grown so unpatriotic that there would not be plenty who would be willing to go to the front if necessary?

Mr. JONES. I have no doubt that when volunteers are called for they will respond.

Mr. JAMES. I do not think it tends to do any good to be casting reflections upon the people of the United States upon the theory that they are not willing to go without they are in command. I have not the slightest doubt that there are an abundance who will go whenever it is necessary, and go to the front as privates.

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senator did not understand that I made any reflection of that kind. I suggested nothing of the sort.

Mr. THOMAS. I meant no reflection at all upon anybody. I know when the time comes the man who carries the gun will be there, not only to carry the gun but to endure the sweat and the toil of conflict.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES. I merely wish to say, in connection with this particular matter, that I did not suppose any discussion at all would arise from the statement I have made. I simply made the statement because it had occurred to me that the proper place to file these telegrams is in the War Department. I did not suppose that we would have anything to do with the assignment of commissions or anything of that sort. I merely wanted it to appear in the RECORD, so that when my people saw that other Senators had been presenting telegrams and applications of this kind in the Senate they would appreciate the reason why I had not presented them here but had sent them to the Secretary of War.

Mr. JAMES. The observation I made was simply for the purpose of expressing my belief that the patriotism of this country had not dwindled so much that the American people in an hour of peril to the flag or of danger to the country were unwilling to go except upon the condition that they were in command.

Mr. JONES. I have not suggested——

Mr. JAMES. The volunteer soldier still lives here, and there will be plenty of them when the time comes, when they are called upon.

Mr. JONES. I want to know whether the Senator intimates that anything I said suggested anything of that kind?

Mr. JAMES. I have not intimated it. I understood perfectly well that the Senator made no such intimation.

Mr. JONES. That is satisfactory.

Mr. JAMES. But the colloquies several times on the floor of the Senate were such that I thought it would not be out of the way for me to make the observation I did.

Mr. JONES. I am satisfied that nobody thinks the private citizens of this country will not volunteer whenever it is necessary, and in ample numbers.

I have another telegram, in the nature of a petition——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. It is really my humble opinion that all these telegrams ought to go to the Secretary of War without being incorporated into the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. That is the course I have been following. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. If the Senator will permit me, I want to make the statement that I have received a telegram from my home town—I have not presented it here—from a company of soldiers—privates, not asking to be officers—who are willing to go to the front, and they authorize me to say so.

Mr. JONES. Surely we will have such requests from all over the country.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senate to the second paragraph of the second subdivision of Rule VII:

> It shall not be in order to interrupt a Senator having the floor for the purpose of introducing any memorial, petition, report of a committee, resolution, or bill. It shall be the duty of the Chair to enforce this rule without any point of order hereunder being made by a Senator.

The Senator from Washington will present what he has risen to submit.

Mr. JONES. I have always felt a delicacy about presenting resolutions affecting the special conditions in any particular State, because I have felt that the Senators from that State could be entirely depended upon to take whatever steps might be necessary in that particular.

I have here a telegram, to which I have called the attention of the Senators from Colorado, who, I know, will do everything that they possibly can and everything that is consistent with the jurisdiction of the United States Government with reference to the conditions in that State. They, I know, deplore the conditions to which this telegram refers and will do all they can to remedy them, and I hope they will not take the reading of this telegram as a reflection on them.

This telegram comes from a large representative labor organization in my State, and I feel in justice to them that it should be read into the RECORD. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, it will be read as requested. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 22, 1914.

Senator WESLEY M. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas press dispatches reveal outrages being perpetrated on United States citizens in Colorado infinitely greater than any reported from Mexico; and

Whereas the most cowardly deed of Huerta, of Mexico, fades into insignificance when compared to the inhuman brutality shown in the report of the finding of the charred bodies of 13 children in the ruins of the devastated tent colony of the miners of Ludlow, Colo.; and

Whereas nothing is more important than that the rights and privileges of American citizens be secured to them in their homes, and in the face of an invasion of these rights all foreign complications become relatively unimportant: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Central Labor Council of Seattle and vicinity, representing 60,000 of the citizens of this city, in regular session assembled this 22d day of April, 1914, does hereby protest in the most vehement manner against the excesses of the Colorado Militia, and demand immediate intervention by the United States Government for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens and citizens of other countries menaced by the fiendish and atrocious conduct of the military establishment of the State of Colorado; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to President Wilson and Senators POINDEXTER and JONES by wire, and that copies be sent the Representatives in Congress and to the press.

S. E. BAULT,
ROBERT H. HARLIN,
GEO. P. LISTMAN,
Committee.
R. LOEWE,
Secretary Central Labor Council.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a telegram from the Chicago Association of Commerce, representing 4,000 members, in favor of the repeal of the law providing for the discrimination between the vessels of this and other nations in the use of the Panama Canal. I ask that the telegram may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., April 13, 1914.

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We have to-day telegraphed the President as follows:

"We wish to express heartily our appreciation of the efforts you are making to secure the repeal of the law providing for the discrimination between the vessels of this and other nations in the use of the Panama Canal. We are assured the official action of this association in favor of no discrimination expressed in resolutions adopted March 8, 1912, and reaffirmed in resolutions adopted March 13 last and transmitted to you, reflects the judgment of the 4,000 firms represented in our membership and, we believe, the sentiment of the Central West."

JOSEPH H. DEFREES,
President the Chicago Association of Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a paper, being a copy of an official call for a woman's national good-roads congress at Chicago June 13 to 20, 1914. I ask that the paper may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICIAL CALL FOR A WOMAN'S NATIONAL GOOD-ROADS CONGRESS AT CHICAGO, JUNE 13 TO 20, 1914.

A woman's national good-roads congress is hereby called by the International Good Roads and Automobile Association, the National Good Roads Association, the Illinois State Good Roads Association, and the Chicago Good Roads Association to meet at Chicago June 13 to 20, 1914, conjointly with the Congress of Woman's Achievements and Exposition of Science, Art, and Commerce at the Coliseum.

During this period the biennial convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs will be in session, with many representative women in attendance from every State of the Union.

Every woman's club and every woman in any manner identified with or interested in this biennial is most cordially invited to become a delegate to this woman's national good-roads congress, and the more than 5,000 women who are members of our national and Illinois State good-roads associations are urged to aid in making this national congress the great success which its objects merit.

Good roads and streets bear such a vital relationship to the home, school, and church and all business activities as to constitute one of the most important economic and social problems of modern times—long neglected and now engrossing the attention of millions of people.

The National Goods Roads Association for 14 years has persistently and unceasingly urged the importance of this matter in every State and Territory, and held during this period more than 1,000 good-roads conventions.

At our Illinois State good-roads convention, held at the Auditorium Hotel, Chicago, on Lincoln's birthday, 1912, a resolution was unanimously adopted indorsing the calling of the first Illinois woman's State good-roads convention by the national and Illinois State good-roads associations, and such convention was held on April 3 and 4 at the Auditorium, and was one of the most successful ever held for any purpose. The presiding officers were Miss Jane Addams, Mrs. Francis D. Everett, Mrs. Minne Starr Grainger, Mrs. John O'Connor, Mrs. Orville T. Bright, and Dr. Sophronisba P. Breckenridge.

Among the more than 50 speakers at the six sessions were Mrs. Philip N. Moore, then president of the General Federation of Woman's Clubs; Mrs. Emmons Crocker, chairman conservational department of the General Federation; Mrs. Laura B. Evans, Mrs. John Worthy, Mrs. John Harvey Brown, Miss Florence King, Mrs. Robert L. McCall, Mrs. Katharine Waugh McCulloch, Miss Kate F. O'Connor, Miss Anna Nichols, Mrs. D. Harry Hammer, Miss Jessie I. Spafford, Mrs. Frederick K. Tracy, Mrs. F. H. Greene, Mrs. Minona S. Jones, Mrs. George H. Huntoon, Mrs. Myra Strawn Hartshorne, Mrs. H. M. Dunlap, Florence M. Holbrook, Mrs. Andrew P. Coon, Mrs. O. P. Bourland, Mrs. Belle Squire, as well as two of Illinois most talented women whose life work is finished—Mary Miller and Francis Squire Potter.

Addresses were also given by Col. William Jennings Bryan, United States Senator Lawrence Y. Sherman, Right Rev. Samuel Fallows, Dr. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Dr. M. P. Boynton, Dr. S. T. Ford, Hon. Lynden Evans, and Congressman Frank Buchanan, Hon. Hugh S. Magill, Hon. Henry M. Dunlap, Judge Frank P. Sadler, Walter D. Moody, and Arthur C. Jackson.

The rapid development of the good-roads movement and recent legislation in this and other States is in no small measure owing to the far-reaching influence of this woman's convention.

With the wonderfully successful political activity of the women in Illinois and other States pointing unerringly to future achievements in every State, no time could be more opportune for representative women from every State convening in national congress to discuss the good-roads movement in all its phases.

The general federation biennial at San Francisco unanimously indorsed the good-roads movement, and the present president of the general federation, Mrs. Percy V. Pennybacker, in a notable address at the Fifth International Good Roads Congress pledged the hearty aid of the 1,000,000 members of the general federation to the cause of good roads, both in the Nation and in the several States.

This woman's congress will be asked to consider the best means of making the 1915 International Good Roads Congress, to be held during the opening week of the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco, of the greatest benefit to women the world over.

No name is nearer to the American heart than that of Abraham Lincoln, yet no adequate memorial of him exists. Perhaps nothing adequate can ever be produced, but the National Good Roads Association has repeatedly in convention indorsed the plan of its president to connect the capital of every State with the capital of every other State with a great Lincoln memorial road, to be built and maintained by the National Government, believing that such a road when so built by all the people would become in reality a truly national memorial; and to so build it that for a hundred years to come it may prove to millions of people a daily reminder of him whose greatest ambition was to serve his fellow men. This woman's congress will be asked for its indorsement, in the confident belief that the women of every State will prefer this great work to be truly representative of all the people rather than of a few private interests.

In furtherance of this great Lincoln memorial road the National Goods Roads Association plans to build upon the grounds of the Panama-Pacific Exposition an exact facsimile of the historic home of Lincoln, at Springfield.

In these efforts of our national association American women and patriotic citizens everywhere are invited to join at this woman's congress in perfecting all necessary plans.

The International Good Roads and Automobile Association. The National Good Roads Association. The Illinois State Good Roads Association. The Chicago Good Roads Association, Arthur C. Jackson, president; Maude E. Jones, secretary; Mrs. Edward L. Murfey, treasurer. The Woman's Pacific Coast Board of Control in the Woman's Tri-State Pacific Coast Good Roads Association, Balboa Building, San Francisco; Mrs. Augustus J. Fairbanks, president; Miss Margaret McGovern, secretary-treasurer. Woman's Association of Commerce, Miss Florence King, president; Dr. Anna R. Ranes, secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to state further, Mr. President, that I have received communications from responsible authorities in the State of Illinois, tendering, in all, the services of four regiments, two of which are equipped and will be ready upon very short notice for service. In no instance have I presented, nor shall I present, any petitions or communications of this kind to the Senate. I have uniformly followed the course of transmitting such communications to the War Department, and shall do so in the future.

Mr. SHERMAN presented petitions of sundry citizens and church organizations in the State of Illinois, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Illinois, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURTON presented memorials of sundry citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Ohio, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 2452, United Mine Workers of America, of New Lexington, Ohio, praying for an investigation into existing conditions in the mining districts of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, praying for an appropriation for the enforcement of the law relating to the protection of migratory birds, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry churches of the State of Arkansas, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BORAH. I present the petition of George D. Bisnett, of Los Angeles, Cal., relative to a compliance with the rules and regulations governing applications for lands for homesteading within forest reserves. Accompanying the petition are certain affidavits and exhibits. I ask that the petition may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and that the affidavits and exhibits accompanying it may also be referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, relative to the statement that has been made, that privates have not offered to enlist, I want to notify the Senate that I have here a telegram in the nature of a request from a lady of Denver, Colo., tendering her services as a volunteer nurse. In addition to that, she offers to give $1,000 a month for the maintenance of the nurse service in the Army. So it seems that all who volunteer are not after commissions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado desire that the telegram be read?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No. I ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD, although I have practically stated the substance of it. It is from Mrs. J. J. Brown, of Denver, Colo.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEWPORT, R. I., April 22, 1914.

JOHN SHAFROTH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If they are calling for volunteer nurses, please tender my services to War Department, with additional $1,000 per month for medical supplies. As you know, I have had lots of experience; so, if needed, can go immediately. Please answer at once.

MRS. J. J. BROWN,
Club Cottage, Newport, R. I.
(Formerly of Colorado.)

Mr. POMERENE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Dayton, Cleveland, Lancaster, Newcomerstown, and Youngstown, all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Audubon Society of the Western Avenue Schools, of Mansfield, Ohio, and a petition of sundry school children of Minerva, Ohio, praying for an appropriation of $100,000 to enforce the so-called McLean law relating to migratory birds, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of Morgan G. Bulkeley Camp, No. 54, Sons of Veterans, of Forestville, Conn., remonstrating against any change in the American flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the No License League, of Oak Bluffs, Mass., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROOT presented memorials of sundry citizens of New York, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the postal and civil service laws, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PENROSE presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Windham County, Vt., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the postal and civil service law, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

STATUE OF ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, out of order I desire to call up for consideration a concurrent resolution received a few days ago from the House of Representatives relative to the acceptance of the statue of Zachariah Chandler. I request that it be again read to the Senate, after which I shall ask for immediate action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that the request made by him can not be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not wish to interfere with the regular morning business, but I thought possibly the concurrent resolution could be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The provision of the rule relative to the matter is as follows:

Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, reprt of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the presiding officer, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I repeat, I do not desire to interfere with morning business——

Mr. SHIVELY. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I should like to have the concurrent resolution laid before the Senate when we reach that order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

THE PANAMA CANAL (S. DOC. NO. 471).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as one document that portion of the message of President Roosevelt of December, 1903, and January, 1904—I have the last copy in the document room—covering the subject of the Panama Isthmus. It contains all the original documents, and I think it very important it should be accessible. Also an address by Mr. ROOT, then Secretary of State, delivered before the Union League Club of Chicago, on the ethics of the Panama question. Also an editorial by Mr. Roosevelt, published in the Outlook of October 7, 1911, on the right of the United States to dig the Panama Canal.

Mr. SHIVELY. I wish to inquire of the Senator if what he proposes to have printed covers all that President Roosevelt said in relation to the subject.

Mr. LODGE. It covers that portion of the annual message of December which relates to transactions in Panama, his message of January 4, which was devoted exclusively to it, and gives all the dispatches and papers, also an address by Mr. Secretary ROOT, as he was then, in regard to the ethics of the Panama question.

Mr. SHIVELY. I was only desirous, if there was to be a publication, that everything should be included which related to the matter.

Mr. LODGE. I endeavored to get everything. I will say to the Senator there is one other document that ought to be printed with this, and that is the letter of Secretary Hay to Gen. Reyes. There is no copy of that left in the document room.

Mr. SHIVELY. What was the date of that letter?

Mr. LODGE. It is printed in Foreign Relations of the United States for 1903, but at the time I had no means of obtaining it for printing, because I could not get a copy, or I should have had it included. I will endeavor to have it incorporated later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION COMMISSION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 142) authorizing the Vocational Education Commission to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance as may be necessary, and so forth, I report it with an amendment and I submit a report (No. 442) thereon.

The joint resolution simply proposes to correct a defect in a former resolution and to authorize the use of the appropriation for the clerical force. We were under the impression that the joint resolution would be held to have so provided as originally drawn, but the Comptroller of the Treasury insists that the force of clerks can not be paid under the original resolution. Therefore I ask unanimous consent for immediate action on the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution just reported by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. The amendment of the Committee on Education and Labor was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "assistants," to strike out the words "as may be necessary" and to insert "and to have printed such of the testimony taken before the commission and reports of the commission as the commission may deem advisable," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the commission to consider the need and report a plan for national aid to vocational education provided for in the joint resolution approved January 20, 1914, is furthermore authorized to employ such stenographic and clerical assistants and to have printed such of the testimony taken before the commission and reports of the commission as the commission may deem advisable, the total expenditures of said commission not in any event to exceed the amount of $15,000 heretofore appropriated for the expenses of said commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. O'GORMAN, from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, to which was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 10th instant, relative to an increase in the salary of the assistant clerk to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, reported favorably thereon and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed, which was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 15906. An act providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 5377) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Nottingham, N. H., condemned cannon and balls; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5378) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Chambers (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 5379) granting an increase of pension to Amanda M. Startsman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 5380) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Pittsburg, Okla., one condemned bronze or brass cannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 5381) granting a pension to Daniel W. Setzer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 5382) to correct the military record of James Judd; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 5383) granting a pension to James W. Allen; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 5384) granting an increase of pension to Wealthy L. Kelsey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 5385) granting a pension to J. W. Metler (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,500 for salary of assistant in charge at the Pacific Coast Fisheries Station, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN MEXICO.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15906) providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico. The bill proposes to appropriate $500,000 for the relief of American citizens in Mexico, including transportation to their homes in the United States. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill reported by him. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If unanimous consent is given, does that limit the debate on the bill to five minutes on the part of each Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not; it does not come up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say that I am heartily in favor of the immediate passage of this bill. I would be in favor of it if it carried many, many times the amount it does.

No doubt the Senate is aware of the fact that I voted against House joint resolution 251, justifying the employment by the President of the armed forces of the United States in enforcing certain demands against Huerta. I want the Senate to understand that I did not vote against that joint resolution because I——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has unanimous consent been given for the present consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to this rule:

3. Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the presiding officer unless by unanimous consent; and, if such consent be given, the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up.

The question is whether or not the Senate will give unanimous consent to the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought unanimous consent had been granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the rule, then, this bill is not only not subject to amendment, but it must be passed without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is as to whether unanimous consent shall be given to the motion made to proceed to the consideration of the bill. Unanimous consent has not been given.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It amounts to a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I respectfully submit that a request for unanimous consent is very different from a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed now to the consideration of the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can make that request, and it is competent for the Senate to grant it. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House bill which has just been read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 15906) providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $500,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President, for the relief of American citizens in Mexico, including transportation to their homes in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will state that I thought unanimous consent had been granted, or I would not have asked recognition of the Chair. In this connection, Mr. President, I do not believe that I will speak more than five minutes. I do not expect to make any extended remarks at this time, but I did not have an opportunity, or, rather, I did not feel justified in taking the time of the Senate in the early hours of the morning when House joint resolution 251 was passed.

I was saying, when interrupted, Mr. President, that I voted against joint resolution 251 not because I was opposed in any way to upholding the honor and dignity of the United States flag but because I believed in my heart that the facts presented by the President of the United States in his address delivered to Congress in joint session on the 20th day of April, 1914, were not sufficient to justify a declaration of war against Mexico. Mr. President, I remember what has happened in Mexico affecting American life and property in the past; I could not help thinking of the thousands of citizens of my own State who had been driven from Mexico, many of them murdered and all their property destroyed, many of their women ravished and their children slaughtered, and that being the fact it was no more than my duty to support the amendment offered by way of substitute by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and oppose the resolution worded so it would not reflect upon Carranza and Villa.

I supported President Taft in his policy of nonintervention, and as soon as President Wilson was inaugurated as President of the United States, on, I believe, my first visit to him, I expressed my belief that the policy of nonintervention in Mexico was the proper policy to be followed by the Government of the United States. Months afterwards I also told President Wilson that I was in full accord with the policy which he had adopted in relation to nonintervention, and, notwithstanding the people of my State had suffered and millions of dollars worth of their property had been destroyed, I still would uphold him in nonintervention, because I would rather see all the property that they ever owned or ever would own destroyed than to see the lives of American soldiers sacrificed, as would be the case in a war with Mexico.

I had indulged the hope, Mr. President, that war with poor, distracted Mexico could have been prevented, but now that war is actually existing between Mexico and the United States I want the President of the United States and all of the people of this country to know that there is not a Senator in this body who will more strongly uphold the hand of the administration in enforcing order and law, and, if necessary, going to the utmost limit of the power of this Government in order to establish peace in that unhappy nation than myself.

I simply wanted to say this much this morning so that my position might be understood. We are now engaged in war. I am not going to discuss how it was brought about, and from now on, so long as we are at war with Mexico, so far as my vote shall count and so far as my influence can go, they will both be directed toward upholding the administration in its action in Mexican affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it occurs to me that at this time the situation with reference to Mexico has undergone such a change that we ought to take counsel and get our bearings as to what we are going to do. I feel, Mr. President, that if our citizens are to come out of Mexico, if we are to arrange to bring them out as a matter of necessity, we ought to declare our policy with reference to what this Government is going to do in the matter of further interfering with the internal affairs of Mexico.

I always sympathized with the President in his hesitancy in the recognition of Huerta. I felt that if we should ever recognize Huerta it should not be with any undue haste and only from absolute necessity. I therefore sympathized fully with the President so long as he stood upon that proposition, and that alone. When, however, the President practically announced that a certain individual could not be a candidate for the Presidency in Mexico, and that we would in effect censor the elections which were to be held in Mexico, he announced a policy the inevitable logic of which was war with Mexico unless that policy was afterwards to be modified. I thought then, and I think now, there is no escape from war unless we furnish the escape ourselves through a change of policy.

When we undertook to censor the internal conditions of that country, and to place ourselves in the position of determining what government consisted of in Mexico, it was necessary as a consequence of that that we must some time go there to carry out that program. The supposition was that with Huerta removed there was some other force or some other power which would take his place and establish law and order in Mexico, and establish such a government as the Republic of the United States could afford to acknowledge and recognize. Now, however, that hope seems no longer to invite our confidence. That supposition would seem no longer to exist, certainly if it exists it is without foundation in fact. We are at armed conflict with Huerta and all the forces Huerta represents, which are supposed to be from ten to twelve millions of the people who live in Mexico; and this morning we are advised that we are at war with Carranza, or are to be at war with Carranza, unless we change our program. So the inevitable logic of this program is that we are upon this occasion at war with Mexico, and in all probability before another 48 hours shall have passed we will be at war with united Mexico. It therefore devolves upon us as a Congress to determine, not whether or not we shall require amends from an individual or a usurper in Mexico for an insult to the flag, but whether or not we as a Congress are ready to recognize the fact that we are at war and are prepared to carry on war with Mexico. While I was willing to take the judgment of the President so long as he was doing those things which he had a right as an Executive to do even without our authority, when it comes to carrying on war I feel the Congress, the war-declaring power, should be heard.

There can be no doubt of the situation. No one doubts what the forces of Huerta will do, and I apprehend no one can doubt what the forces behind Carranza will do. If we continue to encroach upon the sovereignty of Mexico and to attack the people of Mexico, we must no longer expect to contend with the divided forces of Mexico, but we must expect to contend with the united forces of Mexico.

Is the Congress of the United States ready or prepared to remain silent while this war is being carried on in this way? I do not stop to discuss the wisdom or the unwisdom of any act or acts which have led us to this condition. I do not stop either to criticize or to eulogize. I simply call your attention to a condition which confronts us, and that is open war with the Republic to the south.

Mr. President, for myself I do not want to see war. I think when this bill passes it ought to be declared as the policy of the Congress of the United States that the Republic of the United States will withdraw as an interfering power in Mexico, will withdraw as an interfering power in Nicaragua, will withdraw as an interfering power in Honduras, and say to the Republics of Central America, "We will respect the integrity of your Governments, and we will approach your borders only when asked to do so by yourselves, and then only in a most friendly manner. We recognize and will respect the autonomy of your States; we will never come to you except as an older brother."

It is said that the United States to-day is the most unpopular member of the family of nations, and it is attempted to be said in these days that it is so by reason of the fact that we disregard our treaty obligations. That is not the reason. The reason is that we have an utter incapacity to attend to our own business and to leave the internal concerns of other Governments to the people within those Governments. Do the people of the United States understand to-day that the only Government in Nicaragua is the Government which the United States provides? Do the people understand that if the marines were withdrawn from the white house at Managua the Government which exists there would dissolve like mist before the sun? Do the people understand that we are sustaining there by force a Government which is in contravention of the wishes of 80 per cent of the people of Nicaragua?

The reason why we are unpopular and suspected is because, while protesting friendliness to these smaller nations, we are in subtle and devious ways constantly encroaching upon and ingratiating ourselves into their affairs, with the ultimate object, as the world believes, of taking possession of them and controlling their sovereignty.

For myself, therefore, I want to see the Congress of the United States declare its policy with reference to Central America. I took the liberty of saying the other day that, in my judgment, if the flag of the United States ever went up in Mexico it never would come down. I do not modify my views this morning in the least as to that proposition. I would regard it a national disaster; I would regard it a national crime; yet, in my humble judgment, if we go to war against the united forces of Mexico we will be in contention with them until such time that we will lose the habit of coming out. Crowding in behind our army of intervention will go the American citizen and American capital, and conditions will arise which will make it all but impossible to come out. I understand, of course, that there are those who will criticize me for saying this, but there is no reason why we should add to our other sins that of deception.

I do not mean by this to impeach at all the integrity of the President or challenge the sincerity of his views as expressed at Mobile. I have no doubt that the President expressed his honest conviction when he said we wanted no more territory; but that is a declaration we have been making from the time Thomas Jefferson purchased Louisiana, when he believed it was in contravention of the Constitution of the United States to do so; that is what we said while taking New Mexico and California, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. Neither the President of the United States nor any other individual can control the logic of events nor measure the consequences or curtail the results of war, and the policy which we are pursuing—not only this administration, but the preceding one—will inevitably lead to the United States taking every foot of land from here to Panama as time goes on. I repeat that I would regard it as a national crime and a national calamity to do so.

Let me read to you the statement of one whom you will deem wiser and more conservative than myself upon this question—Norman Angell, the author of The Great Illusion, one of the world-famed advocates of international peace, a gentleman of recognized conservatism and of great ability. An article in the Evening Post a day or two ago quoted him as follows:

> Norman Angell, * * * one of the foremost champions of world peace, asserted to-day that once intervention began in Mexico we could only expect that political momentum would sweep us along until we reached the Panama Canal.

Mr. President, had my interview appeared after this statement I would have been charged, not with radicalism, not with being a western jingo, but with plagiarism.

> That destiny would mean, said Mr. Angell, the absorption of from twenty to twenty-five million alien people not of our language, laws, or civilization, and the lamentable result would be that this country would have an "Irish question."

Again, he says:

> We can not take sides in Mexican politics, and assume that one party, like the constitutionalists, are the good people and the other party are the bad people. Even if it were possible to balance rights and wrongs, all the evidence goes to show that one party is very little better fitted than another party permanently to maintain good government and order in the Anglo-Saxon sense. If we intervened in Mexico, that intervention must have some meaning and some permanent result. Merely to push our way to Mexico City, make a proclamation, establish a Mexican party in power, and withdraw, would be to expose ourselves to the risk of having the imbroglio just as bad a year or five years hence.

In other words, when we have disposed of Huerta, when we have established ourselves in Mexico, who is going to take the place of Huerta? Where is the power to establish law and order in Mexico? If lives are to be protected and property shielded, who is going to do it? Can you not see without question that there is no power to do it other than the United States itself if we interfere at all in the matter?

Will we trust the lives of our citizens to Carranza and Villa, with the contending forces of the Huertistas against them, in the future? Will they be any safer, or will there be any more peace and quiet in that Republic with one force out contending against the one that is in, than with the force which is now in being contended against by the force which is out?

We ought to say to Mexico: "We will withdraw from interference in your governmental affairs. You can elect whom you will as your President. You can hold your elections as you desire. You can establish such government as in the wisdom of your people you choose to establish. We recognize your right to work out your salvation as the other people of the earth have worked out their salvation; and when you have done so, be your civilization and your form of government up to our standard or lower, we will recognize what you have done."

It is not for us to censure them. There are conditions in some parts of the United States at this very moment which might not make Mexico envious of ourselves.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. In that connection I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that conditions in Mexico now are normal. With the exception of the reign of Diaz—for that is what it was—this has been practically the condition of Mexico since 1810.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator; and it will be the condition until 2010, the way things are now being conducted.

This writer further says:

> If we go into Mexico, we shall stay there—

He must have been a "western jingo"—

> and the political momentum of the thing—the fact that when one gets started full swing along a certain political road it is impossible to stop even if we wish—will carry us through to the Panama Canal, because our entrance into Mexico will not endear the United States to Spanish-Americans, and we shall find the American flag insulted, American citizens assaulted, and American property destroyed in Nicaragua, San Salvador, Costa Rica, Guatemala, San Domingo, and Haiti; and sooner or later, since politics do not stand still, either go back or forward; and we shall not go back; we shall go forward.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator from whom he is quoting?

Mr. BORAH. I was quoting from Norman B. Angell, who, as the Senator knows, is quite a noted writer upon the subject of international peace.

I quote this gentleman for the reason that undoubtedly he expresses his view, as I did, not because he desires such a thing but because of the inevitable result which will follow. However high and patriotic may be the purposes and the motives of the President, however earnest and sincere he may have been in his views as expressed at Mobile, the President of the United States can not control events once the terrible momentum of war sets in upon its devasting and theory-destroying way.

I can not imagine any more sinister influence against the future happiness and prosperity of the United States than that we should take possession of that great territory from here to the Panama Canal, in view of the conditions which exist there. We have been gradually encroaching upon them and establishing protectorates and doing this and that, and loaning them money and cooperating with them in their financial affairs, ostensibly for the purpose of aiding and assisting them. At the same time the great majority of them objected to our doing so. We will continue that process until the protectorate will ripen into sovereignty, until that which is in the first instance mere cooperation will be complete control.

Let us reverse our action. Let there be no mistake as to the position of the United States among the nations of the earth, that we not only do not desire the territory of Mexico or Central America or of a Central American Republic, but that we are not going to interfere in their internal affairs. If they set up a monarchy, let us recognize it. That is their business. If they have a dictator who controls the destinies of those countries, that is not our business. Let us concede them the right to settle their own forms of government, at least until the people, and not some scheming adventurers, ask our aid. This modern theory that the Monroe doctrine devolves upon us to go in and censor the internal conditions of those countries is a modern theory and wholly divorced and apart from the Monroe doctrine as it was conceived by its originators. That doctrine, as it was conceived by John Quincy Adams and Thomas Jefferson and announced by Monroe, never contemplated for a moment that we should interfere with the internal affairs of those Republics or do other than stand guard against the encroachments of European powers. Unmolested from abroad, they were to work out their own schemes of government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator says that it is a modern theory, and I want to add, as an humble Member of this body, that I think it is a monstrous theory. Yet it has been suggested on this floor that it is our duty to supervise practically the affairs of this entire hemisphere.

Mr. BORAH. But the conclusion which I desire to make is this: Does anyone in this Chamber doubt that we are at war with Mexico this morning; not with Huerta, but with Mexico? Now, let the majority and the minority and the President come together again in conference and determine what we are going to do with the facts before us. There is no one upon this side of the Chamber, in my judgment, who will not be willing to lay aside partisanship for the purpose of arriving at some wise course with reference to this almost unbearable, quite deplorable situation. The conditions with which we dealt the other day are no longer before us. A different situation is here. War is being carried on—not purposely, I will say, as to the President—but it is here, and the only war-declaring power under the Constitution should record its mandate and define its policy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is hardly necessary, I think, for me to say that, in common with every other Senator in this body, on this side and on the other side, I shall vote with the utmost cordiality for every appropriation requested by the President in the prosecution of the war in which we are now engaged; and, of course, this appropriation and those which are to follow will be supported in the same spirit and in the same way. The country is at war, and we shall support the Government in every way to enable the administration to carry that war to a successful and, I hope and pray, to a speedy conclusion.

But, Mr. President, there is one point which I think the President ought now to take into consideration, and upon which I think it not unreasonable that the views of Congress should be heard. The other night the amazing spectacle was presented of a majority of the Senate deliberately voting down a proposition to give protection to the life and property of American citizens. That was the naked proposition embodied in the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. President, I do not believe there is a single Senator of those composing that majority who does not wish and desire to give the fullest protection to every American citizen everywhere, and especially in Mexico. The amendment was voted down on the ground, as stated, that my proposition and that of the Senator from New Hampshire enlarged the resolution presented by the committee into a declaration of war. The argument had hardly fallen from the lips of Senators on the other side when we were actually at war without the passage of even the pacific resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from Massachusetts has not correctly stated the reasons why the majority side of the Senate——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will give me time, I will state the real reason.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator has misstated the reason already.

Mr. LODGE. I have stated only one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is not the reason.

Mr. LODGE. It is my opinion that that is one alleged reason.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was not the reason that actuated the majority in adopting the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. The reason given here why my amendment should not be adopted was that it enlarged the scope of the resolution and led us into war. That was the reason alleged here. I am coming to the real reason.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The reason alleged on this side of the Chamber was that the resolution as drawn by the Senator from Massachusetts and supported by other Senators on that side was practically in effect a criticism of the President of the United States for the policy which he had maintained, and that it purported to give as a reason for the present action of the administration the reversal of the President's policy, and to place an interpretation upon the landing of the troops at Vera Cruz which was not intended by the President in his present act.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the reason that I quoted, and I do not think I misquoted it, was set forth in a very able, careful, and serious speech by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] at the opening of the debate, and I quoted it in no adverse sense. The reason the Senator from Nebraska now cites is the one he gave and I never recognized that as any reason at all. I decline to admit for one minute that Senators of the United States can not criticize a policy or a resolution, whether it comes from the President of the United States or from anyone else. It has been done against every President since I have sat in the Senate, and there is no disrespect in it. Are we sent here, representatives of great States of the Union, to be told that we are discourteous because we criticize a policy or a resolution that is offered by somebody and that comes from the White House? Mr. President, we are not helpless dummies. We can and we shall criticize where criticism is deserved without discourtesy and without lack of manners.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. I should like to finish. I shall not be long.

Mr. President, I think, I am sorry to say I am forced to think, the real underlying reason for the exclusion of that most obvious and proper proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire that the President should have authority to protect lives and property of citizens of the United States was refused admission to the resolution because if it had been passed and made a part of the resolution it would have at once complicated his relations with Pancho Villa and Carranza. That resolution, if amended as the Senator from New Hampshire proposed, would have required protection to our citizens in the northern provinces where they have been most injured. Protection in the northern provinces might have interfered with some of the bands now operating under Carranza and Villa. We have read the statement from our quondam ally in the newspapers this morning. They have already drifted away, those bandit allies. Three or four days ago 2,700 stand of arms went over the Mexican border to Villa. Some have gone since, I am told; I do not know how truly. This movement at Vera Cruz was precipitated for the military reason, which I do not question to be a sound one from a military point of view, that it was necessary to seize the arms going to Huerta, because those arms would be used against the forces of the United States, and that it was the most obvious military prudence to stop them for that reason, the force of which I entirely admit. Yet they were allowed to go over the northern border at the same time. You can not do much more for any ally than that. And now we see that Mr. Carranza disapproves of what has been done at Vera Cruz. Hardly friendly in an ally whom we are arming. It will be but a short time when those men of the north are united with the rest of Mexico against us. That is not an unreasonable anticipation. Why are we not taking the ordinary military precaution there? Why are we allowing more arms to go into those parts of Mexico? They will be used against our armies within 30 days.

There is brought to my mind very strongly, sir, that verse that was written by James Russell Lowell at the time of the Civil War:

You wonder why we're hot, John?
Your mark wuz on the guns;
The neutral guns that shot, John,
Our brothers an' our sons.

Now, we are letting the guns and munitions of war go into Mexico, and by and by the mark on the guns in northern Mexico which shoot our brothers and our sons will not be neutral marks; they will have our own marks upon them.

I say, Mr. President, the time has come to stop, as we have stopped at Vera Cruz, the admission of any arms into the Mexican Republic. If war, alas, or armed intervention, can not be escaped, that is the surest way to bring this war to a close. That is the method the President adopted in order to prevent Mr. Huerta from protracting resistance to our troops, and yet arms are going in freely over the border, and I do not think I am mistaken when I say we are in danger of a fight on that border at any minute. I do not want to see those people furnished with weapons.

The thing that seemed worse to me, more than anything else in the whole framing of the issue with Mexico, was this putting us in the attitude of an ally of Pancho Villa. It is an act of friendship and alliance to allow him to import his arms when we do not allow them to go into the rest of Mexico.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, it does not require legislative action to prevent the exportation of arms.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may be done by Executive order, as the former policy was recently overturned by Executive order.

Mr. LODGE. But, Mr. President, the extension beyond the ordinary limitations of the neutrality acts was by special act of Congress. It is under the action taken here that the embargo was laid and that the embargo was lately raised.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Massachusetts is a distinguished member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I presume he has even been in conversation with the President with relation to the Mexican situation.

Mr. LODGE. I have seen the President three times, once with the Foreign Relations Committee, in January, and twice the other day.

Mr. REED. I wanted to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if since the situation at Vera Cruz became acute and our troops were landed he has in any manner urged upon the President the propriety of stopping the shipment of arms across the border, or does he make that declaration now for the first time in the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. The President did me the honor to invite me with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] to the White House on the morning of Monday, the day the message was read. He then read to us his message. Mr. President, I do not like to quote private conversation and I will not do it.

Mr. REED. I would not ask the Senator to do it.

Mr. LODGE. I was not silent as to my views; I was not silent as to the dangers which I thought were involved in the resolution as suggested.

Mr. REED. The point that I am making and that I ask the Senator to answer with reference to it is this: The President sent a message to Congress on Monday. On Monday it was debated in the House of Representatives. It finally came to the Senate for debate, and during the progress of the debate the action was taken which precipitated an armed conflict at Vera Cruz. That was the first time we knew that actual hostilities were inevitable. I wanted to know if since that time the Senator from Massachusetts had in any way made known to the President his views or suggestions that we ought to take similar action with reference to the shipment of arms across the northern border. The thought occurred to me that to answer that question would not be a breach of confidence for the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not seen the President since the firing at Vera Cruz; I have been somewhat detained on this floor; but the result of the seizing of the shipment at Vera Cruz and the blockading of that port and of others to prevent arms going to Huerta, while leaving it open on the northern border to Pancho Villa, was not passed over by me when I had the honor to speak with the President before the delivery of his message and before the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to call my colleague's attention to the fact that at a meeting of the Joint Army and Navy Board on yesterday it is reported that they unanimously recommended that the embargo on the shipment of arms into Mexico be restored. So the President has the humanitarian reason, the reason of self-interest, and the reason advanced by his military advisers why he should act promptly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say. I wished to call attention to this matter of arms because I felt it very deeply, apart from my intense dislike of seeing this country mixed up, directly or indirectly, with a man like Pancho Villa. I now feel that it is utterly wrong for us to be permitting arms to go into Mexico from any point or at any port in that territory, inland or on the seacoast. I think every military reason demands that we should put an embargo on arms everywhere, and I think the distinction that we are making is one that is utterly false, both from the military and from the moral point of view.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I do not care to discuss Mexican affairs to-day, but I think it is proper for me to state to the Senate and to the Senator from Massachusetts that my advices from the border and from what I have always had reason to believe and do believe to be perfectly authoritative sources are that the night before last Pancho Villa arrived in Juarez, reported to be on a visit to his wife at El Paso, unloaded trains at Chihuahua loaded with cattle for shipment to the United States, took with him into Juarez, five minutes distant from the public plaza of El Paso, Tex., 6,000 soldiers; that they are receiving constant shipments of arms, one of which has been seized by the War Department, without authority from the State Department, and that the shipment of arms is not being stopped, but is continuing.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the statement that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has just made of the presence of Pancho Villa with 6,000 soldiers at Juarez, right on our frontier, just across the line from El Paso, seems to me an additional reason for the adoption of measures to stop the shipment of arms, which I hope to see taken. After Carranza's statement, what possible reason can there be for showing him any further consideration? Is it possible that we are so entangled with Pancho Villa that we can not put an embargo on arms crossing the northern frontier? Why, Mr. President, I can not believe that is the case; and it seems to me, I repeat, that on every military ground, on every moral ground, on every political ground we should stop arms going into Mexico just as completely as we can.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts had concluded his remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not always place credence in statements in newspapers; it is unsafe to do so; and yet, as a rule, matters connected with the transactions going on in Mexico as reported to us through the press are accurate. I observed in the Washington Post of this very morning an article concerning the matter of placing an embargo on arms going into Mexico; and, among other things, it says:

For nearly a week—

Nearly a week—

For nearly a week the General Staff of the Army, headed by Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, has urged repeatedly that a general embargo be declared. At first this step was desired not only to prevent the shipment of munitions of war to Gen. Huerta but also to the constitutionalists, on account of the possibility that the latter as well as the other might use them against United States soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. President, if that is an accurate statement, it seems that Gen. Leonard Wood, at the head of the Army, and those associated with him on the General Staff, have been for a week importuning the President to place an embargo on arms going into Mexico, which would, of course, include the northern border as well as Vera Cruz and other seaports in Mexico.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: I quoted a little while ago a paragraph from an article in the Washington Post of this morning. I meant to ask unanimous consent to insert the entire article, which is brief. I now ask that consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be inserted in the RECORD.

The article referred to is as follows:

ARMS FREE TO REBELS—PRESIDENT DECLINES TO RENEW THE EMBARGO—URGED BY MILITARY MEN—CHIEF OFFICERS OF BOTH BRANCHES OF THE SERVICE BELIEVE IT WRONG TO PERMIT PASSAGE OF GUNS, WHICH MAY BE TURNED UPON UNITED STATES SOLDIERS—SECRETARY OF STATE TRUSTS CONSTITUTIONALISTS.

Earnest and almost persistent efforts were made yesterday to induce the President to restore the embargo on arms destined for constitutionalists and offered for shipment across the Texas border, but without avail. The Executive has been advised that the constitutionalists are seeking large quantities of munitions of war in this country; that they are willing to accept firearms and ammunition of any character and to pay for them almost any price.

At least one member of the Cabinet has urged upon President Wilson the advisability—to employ no stronger term—of preventing the exportation of these arms, which, it is contended, may at any minute be turned against American citizens and soldiers.

The Secretary of State has assured the President that he can depend on the good faith of the constitutionalists, and in this assurance he has been strongly backed up by former Gov. Lind. The Secretary has said, further, that he would regard it the extreme of folly to take any steps which might offend the Carranzaists.

WOOD PLEADED FOR PROCLAMATION.

For nearly a week the General Staff of the Army, headed by Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, has urged repeatedly that a general embargo be declared. At first this step was desired not only to prevent the shipment of munitions of war to Gen. Huerta, but also to the constitutionalists, on account of the possibility that the latter as well as the other might use them against United States soldiers, sailors, and marines.

The President has been informed by the Army authorities that reports received from the Mexican border indicate that approximately 20,000,000 rounds of ammunition and 18,000 rifles have been shipped into Mexico since the embargo on such shipments was lifted last winter. It was declared as significant that of this whole amount, 8,000,000 rounds of ammunition and 10,000 rifles have gone from the United States into Mexico since the orders were issued last Tuesday for the dispatch of the fleet to Tampico and Vera Cruz.

BIG CONSIGNMENTS OVER BORDER.

While Rear Admiral Fletcher was preventing the big shipment of German arms and ammunition to Vera Cruz on Tuesday, the importations were continuing in large consignments into northern territory, principally across the American border. The War Department has been informed that even larger shipments got across yesterday, while the department was endeavoring to get the President to issue a proclamation to declare a total prohibition of such shipments. Still other shipments are being rushed from New York and other points.

The proposition that a proclamation be issued against all further shipments was discussed by the joint board of the Army and Navy Monday morning. The recommendation was introduced by Gen. Wood and approved by Admiral Dewey and the other naval members present.

At a White House conference Monday night, which was attended by Secretary of War Garrison, Gen. Wood, Assistant Secretary of War Breckinridge, Secretary of the Navy Daniels, Rear Admiral Victor Blue, Rear Admiral Bradley A. Fiske, and other Army and Navy advisers, a strong argument was made in behalf of the embargo by the Army Chief of Staff.

It was the understanding that the President would approve the entire recommendations, and that the general embargo would be declared before morning. They were surprised, accordingly, on Tuesday to learn that it had not been proclaimed.

The only explanation of the President's failure to put into effect the embargo recommendation is that the Secretary of State advised against it. The Secretary, it is declared, readily approved the plan to put down the embargo at Vera Cruz; but he has been strongly opposed to shutting off shipments to the constitutionalists, upon whom he is said to be relying to assist the United States to overthrow Huerta.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat I should like to suggest, if I am not trespassing——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Michigan merely desire to occupy the floor for an interrogatory?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply desire to say that it is a well-known fact—there is no dispute about it at all—that the arms and ammunition in the former Madero revolution in Mexico and in the present revolution in the north were all procured from the American side of the Rio Grande. Millions of rounds of ammunition were put over there, surreptitiously and otherwise. Inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has asked the question as to whether representations had been made to the President as to the undesirability of continuing such a situation by Executive favor, I want to say—and I think I may do it with perfect propriety, and all of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations know it—that protests by myself and others were made to the President last February when he threatened to remove the embargo and give arms and ammunition more freely to Villa and Carranza, and he was urged by members of the Committee on Foreign Relations not to take such action, as it would be a backward step and the guns that he permitted to be taken across the border might later be used against our own soldiers. I told him at that time that if the revolutionists in northern Mexico were entitled to American arms they were entitled to recognition as belligerents; that it would be lawful to thus recognize a state of war, but that it would be diabolical to give them arms with which to kill one another.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the question I asked had nothing to do with the statement just made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. We all perfectly well understand that when the first gun was fired in Vera Cruz, just a few hours ago, a different situation arose; we all understand that since Carranza made his declaration, which appears in the newspapers this morning—providing, now, that he made such a declaration, and I assume the newspaper reports to be correct—a still different situation arose. The only reason I asked the question of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was to ascertain whether, since these new conditions had arisen, the Senator had made any suggestion to the President, and the Senator from Massachusetts answered that, but the matter which the Senator from Michigan is talking about is an entirely different proposition. To debate as to its wisdom or its unwisdom, in the light of present conditions, would be quite profitless, I think.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not desire to debate it, Mr. President. I merely state it as a fact.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I enter upon any discussion of this particular subject with confessed trepidation, and am doing so because of the challenge in the speech just made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I have not had service in this body measurable to that of the many eminent gentlemen on the other side, some of whom probably are speaking from some degree of personal experience. Nor have I been schooled in those particular things that have made for or prevented war. My experience in war has been limited to a service in the late Spanish-American conflict of an insignificant character so far as any contribution of my own to the conflict personally was concerned, but I should like to say, from my own point of view as I now have it—limited, perchance, by a contracted vision and possibly surrounded by error for want of experience—that if I were asked by anyone on the street what would I say was the reason more than any other why Carranza has asserted, if asserted it he has, that he will war upon our entry into Mexico, I would say it was the conduct of a certain set of distinguished Senators, during the debate upon a resolution tendered by the Democrats which had for its object to give the President of the United States authority to execute fully the blockade essential to the purposes he has undertaken.

If it shall be asked me how I define and detail my accusation, I answer: The President of the United States before the watching world had for months, with a patience to be admired, with a fortitude to be indorsed, bided the conditions in Mexico, suffering taunts to his citizens, outrages here and there to property, wrongs committed in different directions according to the laws of neutrality and the laws of peace and comity. With all of this he reasoned, with all of this he exhibited great patience, hoping that conflict might be avoided by concession of time. Notwithstanding all of this, there were Senators on this floor and men occupying public position elsewhere who gave the world to understand that in the White House was a supine gentleman, lacking conviction on the one hand or courage to execute it on the other. That he had as a Secretary of State a neophyte in matters of war, a zealot in the dream of peace, a mere crusader in the divine undertaking of good will to men and peace on earth; and therefore the administration was incrusted with that manner of men who suffer all forms of affrone to their Nation, all manner of outrage to their country, all violation of law, both of national right and personal honor to America. By this they encouraged these people in Mexico to assume that whatever affront might be put upon us would never be resented by America, because our officials in high places lacked courage for action or intelligence to know when to execute it.

When, however, people in Mexico, taking license from this form of accusation, grew audacious enough to place an insult upon the insignia of authority of this country, the uniform of the Navy, and then there was an effort on the part of the President properly to resent this insult to the full magnitude and dignity it required, what came from certain Senators on the other side of this Chamber? Was there a prompt cooperation paying heed and respect to the uniform as the representative of the Navy, the great defensive force of this country on the water? Was there the certification to the world that the President had endured with patience, borne with Christian humility, sustained by a manly fortitude and self-restraint in all things that can no longer be continued, and that now there comes the moment when force of a legitimate kind should be resorted to and we as Americans should combine with him? No. Promptly there arose a spirit, very clearly evident, first, to haggle upon the terms of the reasons for the blockade; second, to designate in different form over the title of the undertaking that the American public might be lured away from the real cause. On the one hand, there were a set of Senators asserting that it was a mere matter of punctilio to the flag, leaving out all consideration of the real principle involved, and, on the other hand, were those contending that the cause was not sufficient. Senators on the Republican side insisting that the President should not be approved for taking the action for that particular technical cause assigned; Senators, then, would urge that there were larger causes of that these should be recited and upon these should be based his action—otherwise no action should be allowed. But whatever reason Senators gave, it stood out clear before the country that infinitely more gravity, of more violence, of more justification, Senators on the other side were seeking to find some reason to defeat the course of the President, and yet some reason that could justify them before their constituency and their country.

In the meantime these eminent Senators had no other purpose than to find some way which in its final result would defeat their President. They did not pause to consider that if their policy obtained, for whatever reasons they gave, and the President was defeated here before the world, they stood as the authors of the repudiation of their own Commander in Chief, dishonoring him in the presence of his armies as he stood before the world, already under the suspicion of Europe and under the voice of condemnation from Mexico.

Then, Mr. President, was tendered the resolution of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], reciting in preamble outrages alleged, indignities endured, wrongs suffered from Mexico, and asking that the resolution should go out to the world that we had suffered from Mexico these infamies and outrages; that from these people had come these infamies, and then from him and other Senators was the contention that our designating the person, Huerta, was a performance lacking in strength, wanting in wisdom, disclosing the absence of discriminating statesmanship. What was the effect of this? It was to tell the world that there were a set of Senators here who did not believe the President of the United States when he declared that he desired no war with Mexico; when he alleged that we had no desire to war against the people of Mexico; when he asserted that the people of the United States sought no conflict with the people of Mexico; that his object was to right the wrong which had been done the colors of this country and the affront to the honor of its Navy on the part of those who had inflicted these offenses.

By all this the Senators on the other side who tendered, from time to time, their different opposing propositions and resolutions gave the country to understand that they repudiated the message and the object of the President. What was that?

First, Mr. President, let us view this matter calmly. The President of the United States, speaking for his whole Nation, told the people, for whom he spoke, that there was no intention of entering Mexico for conquest nor to make war upon its people; that what was sought was a measure of peace; that he was seeking to execute this blockade in order to accomplish the single purpose of resenting the wrong to the uniform, the insult to the Navy of this country, and to do it by the method that is recognized both in international law and by the system that has long prevailed in the course of similar conflicts.

Was there anything at the time the President sent his message to indicate that such a step as he was taking would in itself mean war? Far from it. The precedents which guided him prove just to the contrary.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that at Greytown there was an insult to the American flag. Minister Borland had assisted an American ship and was assaulted on the street. The Secretary of the Navy, in July, 1854, sent the U. S. S. Cyane to Greytown to obtain redress and an apology. These were refused by the local officials, and, according to notice, Capt. Hollins, at the expiration of the time limit of 24 hours, bombarded the town, after first taking in his steamer such persons as desired to go. President Pierce took occasion in his annual message to Congress on December 4, 1854, to defend this very action from foreign criticisms that had been harsh and unjust.

We recall that when our President seized the customhouse at Vera Cruz, after receiving information from the Secretary of the Navy as to what was transpiring at Tampico—the threat to land arms and ammunition by Huerta to use against us—he likewise pursued precedent.

It will not be forgotten that in 1895 British naval forces were landed at Corinto, Nicaragua, and occupied the customhouse for 10 days, until an agreement was reached for the payment of an indemnity.

Sir, I remind the Senate that in 1838 France declared a peaceful blockade of ports in Mexico, and the Mexican Government, resenting this act, declared war and sought to expel the French.

In 1861 the British Government demanded of Brazil redress for the plundering of a British vessel off the Brazilian coast and satisfaction for what was termed an outrage on the officers of British men-of-war by the Brazilian guard. When these demands were refused the British admiral instituted a pacific blockade of the port of Rio de Janeiro and seized five Brazilian vessels as an act of reprisal. The matter was subsequently adjusted. In none of these cases did war follow.

Mr. President, was it unnatural, then, that the President of the United States of America should pursue the only precedents that were then in existence? When they have been pursued and brought into the Senate for approval let us pause and contemplate what happened.

We behold that Carranza is in one portion of Mexico leading what he terms a revolution. Villa is in another leading what he terms likewise his revolution against Huerta. Promptly there arise on the floor of this Chamber Senators on the other side calling themselves Republicans, with no other object than to badger the administration, than to torture it in its course, than to impede it in its progress, either to obtain political favor to their party or to prevent what they fancied was a legitimate political inheritance of approval on the part of this side. They first begin to present the lawyer's objections to the wording of the resolution; then the political objections to the objects of the resolution; then their partisan objections to the success of the resolution.

What were the objections tendered by these distinguished gentlemen? First, that it was our duty to declare war on Mexico. This was sounded to the ears of Carranza and to the intelligence of the world. It was heralded that there were Senators here willing and ready, notwithstanding the desire of the President to avoid it, to plunge this country into a war with Mexico, that they might certify to the country that they were first to the undertaking; that they might supplant such little credit as might come forth to the administration in power as a result of the steps it had taken.

So to these men, Carranza and Villa, from these Senators there came the certificate that they demanded the United States to make war. To these "generals" there came the assertion on the part of these eminent Senators that they believed there was a cause of war. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and the able Senator from New York, both members of the Foreign Relations Committee, did not hesitate to certify on the floor that it was their belief that the resolution should embody charges against Mexico of indignities suffered by the United States, of outrages endured by its people, of infamies tolerated by the Nation that we had borne in a cowardly attitude too long to be continued. These Senators asserted that the hour had come when we should tell the nations that for these things a cause of war had arisen against Mexico, that that war should be upon those who had inflicted these injuries, and that now this Nation should proceed to assure the world that war was the object; not, as the President had said, peace the purpose.

Was it unnatural, then, that these men, occupying their places in Mexico at the head of armies, would have enhanced their own influence over their own forces by pointing to the fact that a part of the American Government in power was now ready to declare war on Mexico notwithstanding the effort on the part of the President to avoid it? Was it at all unnatural that they would then be put in the position in Mexico that would be expressed by the declaration "You are now with Huerta in the defense of Mexico or you are with the United States that now threatens to invade Mexico"? Mr. President, here are Senators on the Foreign Relations Committee, long in service, some who have been Secretary of State, some Secretary of War, one long the leader of the Foreign Relations Committee, who advise the world that, speaking from their point of view, war upon Mexico should be had, war upon Mexico is justified, and thus they place these men, leaders of Mexican revolution, in a position where, in order that they maintain any influence at all, they must repel the inference that they could be our allies or aids, even silently, when we were pressing on them a force that was then threatening an invasion upon their land. To the contrary to dispute such and defend against such they must declare against us a war of retaliation or revenge.

Then, Mr. President, if Carranza is discovered by this morning to have taken that standpoint and attitude, to whom do we owe it? I charge we owe it to the able Senators on the other side who have put us before the country in the position of demanding war and refusing to support the President in the policy of peace, which it was his purpose to effect.

Then, Mr. President, came that other set of resolutions, tendered from the other side, reciting that the purpose of the United States was not conquest in Mexico. I refer to the resolution of my able friend from Wisconsin, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, whose personality endears itself to my affection. When that resolution is tendered, setting forth that the United States does not enter Mexico for conquest, that its purpose is to subjugate disorder, give peace, and retire; this, preceded with a similar resolution coming from two other sources, not so artfully worded, but to the same effect—these resolutions are defeated on vote.

Could Senators assume they would not be defeated? Why, what do my eminent friends on the other side think, when here is a message from the President of the United States, who certifies to the world that such is our object—peace, not conquest; to give law and order, not disorder and chaos; to resent an injury to our country and an affront to our flag committed by Huerta, not to wound the Mexican people or to destroy their nation. Mr. President, shall we vote on this side that we regarded the President of the United States a hypocrite; that when he spoke for us and spoke for you there was in his heart a lie; shall we say that it was necessary there should come a resolution from you, to be approved by us, to execute this policy, because we had neither confidence in the declaration made by the President nor faith in the professed intention to execute it?

Let us regard these resolutions for a moment in the light of Mr. Carranza's assertion, if it be true. To defeat the resolution was only to assert to the country that, as the President had asserted previously the same as being his object, we voted him our confidence. In defeating these resolutions we but certified that the declaration of the President to the same purpose had our complete confidence; that it was not necessary to fortify it with another evidence in form of resolution from the Republicans. Therefore we declined to cast suspicion upon him by taking the declaration from some other source.

Had it been passed, I call the attention of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, Senator LA FOLLETTE, to this contemplation—and I speak of him because the motive in his heart was of a different order than that of certain other Senators—speaking with great respect to them. To himself I attribute the purpose of humanity. To certain others I charge the objects of politics. But had the resolution been passed, behold its effect: It would have been to announce to the world that the President was not trusted in this body; that, though our Commander in Chief had said the same, what he said was not believed. That it was necessary to have from the other side a declaration affirming the policy for us to trust it.

Then what would have gone forth? That this body had so little confidence in the declaration of the President that they were compelled to surround him with a cordon of protection and a barricade to prevent him from violating his instructions to us and his own declared policy to the Nation.

What a reflection upon the Chief Magistrate. What an unjust allusion to and unfair condemnation upon the sincerity of his declarations. And when such had been done, Senators, do not forget, Mexico would then have said, "Yes; we remember very similar declarations passed by Congress in the matter of the Philippine Islands; but since the President of the United States is not trusted by the Senate, it is very clear that these resolutions are hypocrisy."

They would say the Senate saw that the President did not mean what he had said. They would say that the Senate heard him deliver his message. They saw his face. They knew the atmosphere that surrounded him. They knew he was not sincere, and then charge that because of that they were compelled to introduce these resolutions in order to strengthen the purpose or to give it the verity of truth and honor.

Then suspicion of the President would have gone broadcast in the land. Then color would have been given to accusation of his motives on the part of the Senators on the other side.

Gentlemen of the Senate, you who participated in this long delay, you who found so much sympathy for the struggling Mexican, who beheld him in his unfortunate plight, who saw him in his miserable dejection, who beheld him in his sad distraction, but could see nothing of the dishonor upon your own Nation, the contempt upon your national uniform, the humiliation put upon your own President, the dying of your own soldiers, the disgrace upon your own Republic—you could invite these military leaders in Mexico, under the accusation you made against your President and your country, to combine against your own children to their slaughter and against your own country to its dishonor.

Gentlemen, if there be any on the other side who wish to continue this course, I welcome him to the consequences of the undertaking.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, as a word painter the Senator from Illinois is in a class by himself. He talks so easily that I am fearful that he sometimes exaggerates what he really has in mind. For 13 months——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I did not yield to the able Senator from Massachusetts to interpolate an oration at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois decline to yield further?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for an inquiry. If the Senator has an inquiry, I yield for it. If not, I prefer to continue; and the Senator can then take the floor in his proper time and complete such little allusion to myself as he regards as having the significance of humor. There is an unhappy quality on the part of some men who apparently fit Chesterfield's denunciation of those who are unable to discriminate between wit and rudeness; but I have only apology to make in their behalf. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I put my inquiry in the form of a question by saying that for 13 months Senators on this side have been under bond not to discuss the Mexican question. Does the Senator from Illinois think it reasonable to criticize Senators for discussing for 24 hours an important question the course of which they have disapproved for 13 months, but which they have refrained from discussing during that time at the request of the administration?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator's question. I know nothing of the motives that caused the Senators to refrain, if refrain they did; but I am not now, as the Senator would intimate, criticizing anyone for discussing anything. Discussion I ever invite and approve. It is the method of the discussion that was adopted, the things done, the words asserted, the accusations set forth under the color and privilege of discussion at the critical hour that surrounded these eminent men at the time of their particular course that I censure. I say "yes," for discussion; and I am not now discussing the Mexican question. I am discussing the accusation brought by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], fortified by the skillful logic of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. He asks why an embargo is not now declared with a view of avoiding what he thinks will be the consequence of the cooperation of Carranza and Villa with Huerta. I answer that if there has now been brought about the aspect of a possible cooperation on the part of these men they have been invited to it by the fears stimulated in their hearts by the charges on the opposite side of this Chamber that war with Mexico as Mexico should be declared; that the object of the President to have peace was not real; that war was the real purpose, and should have been declared; and that the reasons set forth should be indignities and outrages by Mexico upon the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. While the Senator has not done me the honor to mention my name, yet the part I played the other evening in trying to amend the resolution puts me in the class of Senators whom he has, I think, unjustly criticized. But even if the Senator's contention is right, if the purpose on this side was to have war declared, which, of course, we all disclaim, does not the Senator think that the time has arrived to place an embargo on the exportation of arms into Mexican territory on the northern border as well as on the seacoast?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that I may continue my remarks.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside until the pending bill can be disposed of and the Senator continue his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER rose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I appeal to the Senator from North Dakota in charge of the unfinished business to allow it to be laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to get some information as to how long this discussion will probably last. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has been attempting to close an address which he began on the 14th. I should like to see that he gets that opportunity this afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is impossible for me to give any indication as to the time that will be required. I had not anticipated that there would be any debate on the pending bill, and I would be glad to see it discontinued as soon as possible. I expect to forego saying a single word, notwithstanding there is much temptation to reply to things which have been said. I hope the debate will be ended very soon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is asked by the Senator from North Dakota that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senators.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that he did not understand the question I propounded.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not understand the Senator from New Hampshire and would be very glad to have him repeat it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will repeat it in as brief form as possible. I suggested that whether the contention of the Senator is right or not that Senators on this side took an attitude that was equivalent to declaring that war ought to have been made upon Mexico by the Chief Executive, does not the Senator think the time has now arrived when an embargo should be placed upon arms and munitions of war into Mexico on the northern border as well as on the seacoast?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire desires my judgment as to whether an embargo should now be enforced, not that he is interested in what my opinion is, but asking the question merely to tender some justification for the assault made again this morning by the Senator from Massachusetts upon the conduct of the President at the time when the President is seriously burdened with the problems connected with the present conflict, I have this to say: Whether an embargo should or should not be lifted depends upon the knowledge of the circumstances. The President and those charged with matters of this administration are in touch with all sources of information. Upon this information they are acting according to their wisdom, and it is not for me, and with respect to such prescience and gift of prophecy as may endow the other side, nor for them, to assume that our knowledge is superabundant to the information that exists, and according to that information the President can be trusted to do that proper thing which will most effectually protect this country and achieve the purpose the administration has in view.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for a question, because I must respect the desire of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not to ask a question, but to express my admiration for the concise manner in which the Senator has answered the question I propounded a moment ago.

Mr. LEWIS. It is a source of great pleasure to me to find in the Senator from New Hampshire some evidence of capacity to discriminate between that which is excellent and that which is objectionable, for so often has he been capable of producing that which is politically obnoxious both in sentiment and action that this judgment of his earns my admiration.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not understand what the Senator said. He lowered his voice, which is not his usual custom.

Mr. LEWIS. No; not except in humility in the presence of greatness. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There must be order in the galleries.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely said to the Senator in all good nature, and we all know what a sweet-tempered gentleman is the Senator from New Hampshire, that it was a source of admiration to me to hear that there was something in my conduct that meets the approval of the Senator from New Hampshire. He referred to what he called my "concise manner," and while his sarcastical allusion was not lost upon me I was unable to give evidence that it was as keenly cutting as he hoped, and therefore I could not bleed for his gratification. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LEWIS. I would prefer to continue my remarks, unless the Senator from New Hampshire has really something to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire does not arrogate to himself the ability or the power to say things that are so instructive and interesting as the Senator from Illinois entertains us with. I had no purpose of being offensive to the Senator in the least, and I have no purpose now; but the Senator's offensive allusion will go into the RECORD for what it is worth. I care nothing about it.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from New Hampshire is in error to assume that my allusion is offensive. It was not my purpose, and while I may yet indulge in a gentle passage of arms, I assure him my sword when leveled toward him is tipped with a rose. If there was anything offensive in my observation, I certainly withdraw it.

Mr. President, I resume and ask what is the question before us? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and my able friend, his colleague, the junior Senator from Massachusetts, called attention to this question. The Senators from Massachusetts hold the administration up for criticism because it has not enforced an embargo upon arms which go into certain portions of what is known as the revolutionist country of Mexico.

Mr. President, I am not able to state at this time—and I answer the Senator from New Hampshire with absolute directness—the nature of what are the circumstances that would call for the enforcement of the embargo or the upholding of it. This much is in my mind: Speaking wholly from my point of view, unless there is absolute evidence that these leaders, so-called revolutionists, are averse to us, that previously, having withdrawn the embargo, closing it now would probably be announcement to the Carranza and Villa forces that they were now included in our movement of hostility, and would be the very first evidence to Carranza and Villa that the charges made by Senators on the other side, that war would be made upon them, had been accepted and acceded to by the President. Then they would be found, with all their spirit and with all their power, united to frustrate the effort of peace which the President has attempted to put into effect by inaugurating the thing that has been undertaken.

Now, Mr. President, I trust, I sincerely trust, that the time will not come when any condition in Mexico will make it necessary for this country to declare war upon its people, and to that end I implore that Senators on the other side shall pause to consider some other expediency from time to time than the mere political advantage to be gained by opposing the President as Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy in his undertaking.

But, sir, I call attention to that other and more important thing, that hope, as we may hope, that there shall not be war; and indulging, as I do, the solemn utterances of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], as he invoked Heaven that it may guide us away from such destiny, I say that at least some practicable method under the guidance of God could be suggested by the distinguished Senators. It is that they have more of patriotism and less of partyism in this important hour. That when there shall be an effort made by the Commander in Chief, at the head of this Republic, to accomplish an object, they certify to the world that they join in aiding and assisting him, and are not seeking to frustrate and obstruct him, and will not for mere partisan purposes or because of political prospect render by false criticism and unjust calumny the President of the United States, as a captain repudiated by his aids before the world.

Mr. President, the only object at this time we have in Mexico, as I see it, is to bring about proper reparation for an insult to the colors of the country, which in themselves speak the honor of the Nation. Is there a Senator who desires to oppose that? Mr. President, I deny the patriotism of my distinguished colleagues or of any man who, in an hour like this, would marshal under the banner of partisan politics those who in spirit are traitors and in action are cowards.

Senators all, I present to you that other reflection that in an hour like this we cease as Democrats or Republicans, that we no longer view the man at the White House as head of any political party. Let us pause as Americans and contemplate him as he stands with his solemn responsibility. Let us salute him as our Commander in Chief, present arms to the flag, and move in solid phalanx to his support as we certify to the world that the one sentiment of the American patriot is, that in conflicts at home divided we may be; but against foreign foe united we shall be. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules of the Senate forbid manifestations of approval or disapproval by the occupants of the galleries.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have listened with pleasure to the beautifully rounded periods and dulcet tones of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. With his expressions rallying us around the flag, calling upon us not to criticize the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army, we all agree. But he is uttering those sentiments and making quotations which are applicable to a state of war. Once in war, of course, whether we agree or whether we disagree with any particular line of action, it is the duty of Americans to support absolutely the President without questioning his efforts, without hesitation for a moment; but in one breath the Senator calls for this united action and in the other insists that there is no condition of war, but of peace, existing. So long as it is a question of peace or bringing about peace or conferring or consulting with or cooperating with the President, as the President in his message asked the Congress to do, I do not see that a Senator, intrusted by a sovereign State of the Union with a commission here, in offering his counsel to the President, conferring with the President, offering cooperation with the President, is precluded from pointing out that which he sees himself. Does the Senator answer the Senator from Massachusetts that in time of peace, blindly, the Senate shall not listen to any voice, shall not receive or consider any information coming from any source, shall not for one moment discuss a mistake, if it be a mistake, of the State Department, which, war not being declared, has jurisdiction over the shipment of arms to Mexico, that we, Senators from the great State of Illinois and the other States of this Union, should be considered as treacherous to the Union, as traitors to the flag, because we seek information and do not take our inspiration from and delegate our power of legislation to one man?

The President has my admiration, sir, and my support. I may not agree with things which he does, and I reserve to myself the right to express my disagreement in so long as he is at this time acting actively as the Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces of the United States. Once admit that we are in war and the suggestion of the Senator might have some weight.

Mr. President, I think it is the intention of the Senators on this side to discuss these matters fully. That is my intention. I reserve to myself the right to call the attention of the Senate of the United States or the President of the United States to what I consider to be the true conditions existing in Mexico, and to advise with him, consult with him, and confer with him, if he will allow me to do so; and whether he will allow me to do so or not, to cooperate with him, despite the rather sarcastic remark of the Senator from Illinois. I am not one to criticize that Senator, for whom I have a very high personal regard, but I can not refrain from expressing the opinion that there has been no partisanship, no intention to make political capital, displayed by Senators. Certainly no such intention has animated me.

But I want to say this to the Senator, in the light of what is happening now in Mexico, what is happening on our border in Mexico, what is being told from one department of this Government to citizens coming here from all over Mexico and begging advice and asking assistance. The city to-day is full of Americans knowing something of the conditions in Mexico, besieging the department, and so long as the control of affairs remains in the State Department they are compelled to go to the State Department for advice. If they believe that the State Department is not correctly advised or is acting under a misapprehension of the conditions in Mexico, if they believe the acts of this department or any other department will result most disastrously to Americans, American interests, American prestige, and will inevitably lead this country into a war with inflamed Mexico, have they no right to be heard? Can they not, through some means, be heard? Must our mouths be closed? Must we refrain from communicating to one another information given to us by responsible, patriotic American citizens? Shall we advise him? Shall we be compelled to close our mouths, as is advocated by the Senator from Illinois, and refuse to discuss our differences as to details simply because the President of the United States chooses to send a message to Congress and to request the passage of a resolution worded in a certain way? Has the Senator no opinion of his own? Is this the commission that he bears from the people of Illinois?

Mr. President, I do not understand my commission to read that way. To me the President is the President of the great United States, and not a Democrat or a Republican, but I can not surrender my opinion. Whenever I think it my duty to express my opinion I will do so without hesitation, even if I am so unfortunate as to merit, or, if not merit, to receive, the censure of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, I do not care to go into Mexican matters this morning. I am more thoroughly impressed, I know, than is the Senator from Illinois with the gravity of the situation, because I know about it and he does not. He seeks no information; he follows blindly where some one leads, who, he says, must be informed. I seek information from whatever source. I make up my mind without dictation, and I shall express it without fear.

I know what is happening in Mexico, sir; I know the communications which are being handed to the War Department, and I know the appeals which are being made from the citizens on our border who are fearful not only of the conditions which may arise in Mexico but of those which inevitably will arise unless something is done on this side of the border line, and that in the very near future. I know that our own citizens on American soil are appealing to those who will not be informed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will take only a moment, and I thank the Senator from Virginia.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] seems rather unfortunate in misapprehending the purpose of my remarks. First, I will assure him they had no allusion to him, but——

Mr. FALL. I did not understand that the Senator alluded to me personally at all.

Mr. LEWIS. I was only going to add, if the Senator himself prefers to apply to himself the unction of Hamlet that "conscience doth make cowards of us all," it can not move me from making such general application of my observations wherever they fit, and Senators, of course, must wear an armor that they feel measures them.

I did not refer to that particular Senator, because there is no Senator's utterances that attracted me so much as carrying with them such a sense of general patriotism and a general desire to free his conduct from what might be called partyism as from time to time the Senator from New Mexico has disclosed, save this: I have thought the point of view of the able Senator from New Mexico was oftentimes blurred and that his vision was narrowed by the geographical relation of his constituency and the personal interest which he felt in honor it was his duty to sustain. It may be that I am wrong; it may be that his point of view is right; but at no time, from my point of view, have I ever urged that there should be no discussion, my point of view being that in the discussion, sir, of whatever is to be discussed there should be a higher consideration in giving aid, comfort, and advice, and assistance to the President, and not that other tendency of deriding and impugning his motives while he be held up to misrepresentations for purely partisan objects.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not know what personal interest the Senator refers to that I might be influenced by. I of course assume nothing from his remarks except that he may refer to the fact that the people on the border are more directly interested in this question than are other Senators.

Mr. President, I have been familiar with Mexico and its people for a great many years. Thirty-two years ago I became interested on the border of Mexico, and I have been interested in a greater or less degree in some way, during all the 32 years, in Mexico and its people. I want to say to the Senator that there is no man on the floor of the Senate and no American in the United States who realizes to a greater degree than I do the many magnificent qualities of the Mexican people. My heart goes out to those people. I have pleaded here on the floor of the Senate for those people in Mexico, for the 15,000,000 people who have been harried by the ambitions of Huerta on the one hand and by the robbery and looting and bloodshed of Mr. Villa and his companions on the other.

These two factions represent a very small proportion of the Mexican population. The mistake—and I say it with great serious regret—the great mistake that is being made to-day is to act upon the theory that Villa, even to the people of the State of Chihuahua and city of Torreon and the city of Chihuahua, represents anything but rapine, lust, murder, and brigandage.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I understood correctly, and I think I did, the gravamen of the charge of my brilliant friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], it was that this discussion and the discussion the other day arose by reason of a desire on this side to play politics, to criticize the President, and to take partisan advantage of an unfortunate situation.

Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I think it has been about 13 months since the President now occupying the White House was inaugurated, and I suggest to my friend he will look in vain in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for any expression of view from me during that 13 months in criticism of the President's policy in Mexico, notwithstanding the fact that I had the honor to advise the President as to my views within some three months after he was inaugurated. I was willing, however, notwithstanding I entertained a different view than the President, to permit him to work out his plans to a successful conclusion, if possible, unembarrassed by any word of mine.

I did not rise for the purpose nor initiate this debate for the purpose of criticizing the President or of reaping any partisan advantage. Everyone knows that there is nothing more dangerous than to try to take partisan advantage of a condition of affairs such as confronts us now. I had no such thought. On the other hand, I see no partisan advantage to be taken.

But, Mr. President, I rose to say that as a Nation, as a people, during this administration and the previous administration, we have pursued a wrong policy toward Mexico and toward Central America; that the time has come for us to reverse our policy, to let the people of Central America and of all the South American States know that neither the President nor the Congress of the United States proposes to interfere in the internal affairs of those countries, let the conditions as to government be what they may. We should stand ready to protect our citizenship, but that is a wholly different matter and does not involve, when rightly attended to, an interference with their governmental affairs.

But if the Senator is of the opinion that the condition now prevailing in Mexico arises by reason of the discussion which took place here the other night, let me refer him to the language of Mr. Carranza himself in his note and to the language of the President.

If it had been my purpose to criticize the President, I could have done so by bringing the language of the President into one column and the language of Carranza into a parallel column to show that the situation in Mexico has arisen by reason of the language which the President used before the Congress and his acts following the delivery of the message. In order to answer as politely as I may and to refute, to some extent, the criticism of the Senator let me call his attention to a paragraph or two of the communication. The President says:

> The manifest danger of such a situation was that such offenses might grow from bad to worse until something happened of so gross and intolerable a sort as to lead directly and inevitably to armed conflict. It was necessary that the apologies of Gen. Huerta and his representatives should go much further; that they should be such as to attract the attention of the whole population to their significance and such as to impress upon Gen. Huerta himself the necessity of seeing to it that no further occasion for explanations and professed regrets should arise. I therefore felt it my duty to sustain Admiral Mayo in the whole of his demand and to insist that the flag of the United States should be saluted in such a way as to indicate a new spirit and attitude on the part of the Huertistas. [Applause.]
> Such a salute Gen. Huerta has refused, and I have come to ask your approval and support in the course I now propose to pursue.

In other words, the President believed that it was necessary to take cognizance of the act of Gen. Huerta as an individual, or as the representative of an organized band of men who professed to represent the Government of Mexico. That is precisely the act to which Carranza objected. He has said to the President of the United States, in effect, that it was an insult to the people of Mexico to even ask upon the part of this usurper, who ought to be upon trial before the Government of Mexico, to salute our flag. Let us see precisely what Carranza says:

> As the Mexican nation, the real people of Mexico have not recognized as its executive a man who had pretended to launch a blemish on its national integrity, drowning in blood its free institutions; consequently the acts of the usurper Huerta and his accomplices do not signify legitimate acts of sovereignty; they do not constitute real public functions of interior and exterior relations, and much less do they represent the sentiments of the Mexican nation, which are of cofraternity toward the American people.
> HUERTA NOT REPRESENTATIVE.
> The lack of representative character of Gen. Victoriano Huerta as concerning the relations of Mexico with the United States, as well as with Argentine Republic, Chile, Brazil, and Cuba, had been clearly established with justifiable attitude of these nations, who have refused to recognize the usurper, in this way lending a valuable moral support to the noble cause I represent.
> The usurped title of the President of the Republic can not invest Gen. Huerta with the right to receive a demand for reparation on the part of the United States nor the right to grant a satisfaction as due.

I beg the Senator to reflect that it was not the speeches of Senators upon this side that aroused the opposition of Carranza, but it was aroused because he believed that it was in derogation of the sovereignty and dignity of Mexico for us as a people to demand reparation from a usurper and a traitor, who is in no way recognized as a proper party to be called upon by any nation to afford reparation, which Carranza supposes involves to some extent the dealing with him as the representative of his country.

It will not do to say that men who come here under their oaths sworn to discharge their duty to their States and to their people are playing politics because they would offer their advice and their counsel in an emergency of this kind. I grant it may be said that while we may make more mistakes than do those upon the majority side by reason of their great leader being in the front, we can not be justly charged when we rise in our places here and offer the best that we have with being coconspirators with the disturbers of Mexico. Let me read a little further:

> Victoriano Huerta is a culprit who is amenable to the constitutional government, to-day the only one, under the abnormal circumstances of our nation, which represent the national sovereignty in accord with article 128 of the political constitution of Mexico.
> WILL TRY ILLEGAL ACTS.
> The illegal acts committed by the usurper Huerta and his partisans and those which they may yet perpetrate, be they of an international character, as those which recently occurred at the port of Tampico or of a domestic character, shall be tried and punished with inflexibility and promptness by the tribunals of the constitutionalist government.
> The individual acts of Victoriano Huerta never will be sufficient to involve the Mexican nation in a disastrous war with the United States, because there is no solidarity whatsoever between the so-called government of Victoriano Huerta and the Mexican nation, for the fundamental reason that he is not the legitimate organ of our national sovereignty.
> Moreover, the invasion of our territory and the permanency of your forces in the port of Vera Cruz are a violation of the rights that constitutes our existence as a free and independent sovereignty and will drag us into an unequal war with dignity, but which until to-day we desired to avoid.

There you see pointedly and positively and unmistakably the cause of Carranza's ire. He leaves no room for doubt, and no ingenuity can be rid of the fact that to invade Mexico for an act of Huerta was in the mind of Carranza a cause of complaint.

Mr. President, it all goes back to the proposition which I suggested this morning, and which I do not propose to repeat, only most briefly, and that is that when we said we must be rid of Huerta it was necessary for us to have some one to take his place, unless we proposed to go there ourselves. When we find that we have no one to take his place, because Carranza objects to our going there, and because he objects to what we are doing, we are left no alternative in the situation other than either to absolutely withdraw from Mexico, leaving the situation to the contending factions, or going there and taking possession. If we are to go there, I think the Senator will concede that we should meet in common council with the President, and this, the war-declaring power, should be consulted before we go.

It is just as certain as that the sun shall rise from day to day that we shall be at war with Mexico unless we change our policy with reference to interfering in the internal affairs of that State. I do not say that some other in the place of the President would have been wiser or more effective in his course, but I do say that the conditions are here, the situation confronts us, we are at war with united Mexico; and the Congress of the United States, the war-declaring power, has a right to be heard. No further step should be taken until the Congress shall authorize what shall be done. Neither a desire for partisan advantage nor partisan subserviency ought to impel us to action or to close our lips upon such an occasion.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am at a loss, upon reflection, to note anything in my own observations that called forth the particular remark of the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]; but previous to my making any reference to that at all, I delight in this place to certify that there is no man whose ability commands greater admiration from me than does that of the Senator from Idaho. As a lawyer, as a student of the Constitution, and as a patriotic citizen, I salute him as a comrade well worthy of the seat he occupies.

Passing from that. I say to him that he, like all others, is amenable to that influence that is designated party organization, and he, like us all, finds emergencies too frequently that call for a political cooperation of effort that is not in harmony with the sentiments of the heart. What said the able Senator as he closed his excellent address? That he thinks he sees in the future war with Mexico if we do not cease interfering with the internal affairs of that country. I say to him, as I say in my position to all who may have occasion to hearken to my utterance, yes; no country, however feeble, will tolerate any invasion into its domestic concerns without at least giving evidence of resentment. Cowardice and pusillanimity would be the inheritance of that country did they take any other course; but, Mr. President, it was because of that very fact that the President of the United States, a historian, a scholar of sagacity, a patriot of reflection, sought to avoid war. In order that there might not be evidence that this Government was assuming to enter into the internal affairs of Mexico, either to control them or to subjugate them, his message came forth, propounding to the world that the object was peace, conciliation—to be accomplished, however, with honor to America. I say to the able Senator from Idaho, no Senator on this floor, more than I, is more jealous of the prerogative of Senators. I agree with the expression of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that we are not dummies; and I agree with the sentiment expressed that we are not expected to be here supine and voiceless, but we are to offer counsel to the President, to tender advice to the administration—that I concede; but I can not concede that under the guise of advice and counsel in the prosecution of a course that is patriotic and just the President should be held up as lacking in intelligence in his course, as lacking patriotism in his demeanor, and wanting in a just conception of his duty. That would be to humiliate the undertaking and to hold the President up before the country as wanting in the attributes that should command the confidence of his aids and counselors, instead of giving him aid and counsel. You do not tender him suggestions affirmatively that he might follow and accept. You are content, too many of you, to stand at a distance and condemn the undertaking that he has invited, to censure the utterances he has expressed, and to denounce the beginning of the cause merely because there may be invented factious differences in the method by which the enterprise may be inaugurated.

What I do seek is that all Senators shall in their sovereign capacity exercise, of course, the prerogative as counselors to the President or in dissenting from his course; but that in such an hour as this they shall render that which the able Senator from Idaho says is their right, counsel and advice, not obstruction and humiliation, and not visit contempt and ignominy upon him before the world merely because they may differ from the partisan attitude occupied by him.

I say to the Senator he is right in the assertion that if ever we enter into the internal affairs of Mexico for the purpose of controlling them we will bring on the very conflict to which he alludes, and that is why I rose to say that where the Senator from Massachusetts now asserts that we should promptly make war upon the revolutionists by changing our policy heretofore applicable to them we should turn ourselves around and do the very thing that the Senator says would be hazardous and enter into the whole internal affairs of Mexico which is to invite the very conflict so forced. If there be any other invitation which should warn and menace him, it is that class of observation that has been indulged in from hour to hour and from day to day since this unfortunate undertaking on the part of Senators upon the other side, who invite all Mexico to believe that our ultimate purpose is to declare war upon Mexico, enter into her internal affairs in the spirit of retaliation, insurrection, and enmity; and it is against that which I raise my voice.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to know if the Senater really thinks it is making war upon Mexico if we place an embargo upon arms and ammunition which are being sent into Mexico to be used against our forces?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator and say to him that it is my judgment, speaking only for myself, that, after the statements which have come from certain Republican Senators in their opposition to the joint resolution designed to give the President the right to use the Army and Navy to enforce reparation for the insult at Tampico, asserting, as they did, that it was time to make war on Mexico, calling Carranza by name a murderer and cutthroat, calling Villa by name a murderer, cutthroat, and brigand, and that it was against those that we should now level our enmities and our sense of retaliation, if now an embargo be put upon arms after the doors had been thrown open to these men and no reason assigned for the change, their followers would attribute it to be the direct result of accusations made on the other side and to the invitation given to us to make war on these men, and probably they would then think that they should ally themselves with Huerta to avenge themselves upon America, which they believe is now about to enter on the very course which the Senators on the Republican side said was our course of duty—invasion and subjugation of Mexico. That is my reply.

Mr. WEEKS. All I have to say about that is that the opinion of the Senator from Illinois is directly contrary to the Army and Navy board and to all other military officers of the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. That may be so, sir, but the Army and Navy board has not at all times commanded my respect; and at this time, without further knowledge on my part of the causes on which they may adjudge, I do not give my approval.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the prompt disposition of the bill and I do not propose to do so. Some remarks, however, of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who is usually just and fair, and I think means to be so in this instance, lead me to believe that he does not understand the true situation. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] and his colleagues upon the Committee on Foreign Relations were asked by the President as early as last August to refrain from discussion of the Mexico problem——

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. To which Senator from Indiana does the Senator from Michigan refer?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I refer to the Senator who is now addressing me, and who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator says that I was requested to refrain from saying anything about the Mexican problem?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not say the Senator was requested; I said the committee of which he is a member were requested to refrain from public discussion of the Mexican problem. Over and over again the late Senator Bacon admonished us that we would be serving the purposes and plans of the administration best if we refrained from commenting on or criticizing the Mexican situation. I think that all my colleagues on the committee—and there are several of them sitting before me—will bear testimony that after that request was made by the Executive we took no action and did refrain from discussion of the Mexican question. It was not only not discussed on the floor of the Senate, but it was not discussed in the Committee on Foreign Relations; and perhaps we appropriately refrained from discussing it, although the situation was important and acute, because the President said he was working out his own policy, and the Secretary of State joined in the request.

When the matter came formally before the Senate the other evening, for the first time an objection was made to the request of the Senator from Indiana, acting as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to proceed by unanimous consent to consider the House joint resolution. That objection was made by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], only that the committee might have full opportunity for consideration of the subject.

Mr. SHIVELY rose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Am I not correct in that statement?

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator knows that it was not the resolution in the form it came from the House that was favorably reported by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, but a substitute, the resolving parts of which had been approved not only by the majority of the committee but also by the minority members of the committee present, with possibly a single exception. It was unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the resolution so reported that was refused by the objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My recollection is that the House joint resolution was laid before the Senate and the Senator from Indiana requested unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution without reference to the committee.

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Senator please, the request for immediate consideration of the resolution as it came from the House was refused. Later unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the resolution subsequently reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, was also refused. The resolution thus reported, and consideration of which was refused, was a substitute for the House joint resolution. Of course the substitute reported was under the number of the House joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, at any rate the Senate, by its refusal to proceed that night when the request was first made, found itself quite unanimously in hostility to the House joint resolution, and a substitute was adopted here as a result of the delay and the discussion, and that substitute was finally passed, it seemed to me, with great promptness. So I do not believe that this side of the Chamber is open to the charge that they have unduly delayed action, or that the discussion has been other than helpful and kindly, even in our wide differences of opinion, toward the President. We are very anxious that the bill now before the Senate shall be disposed of promptly. There will be need for the money appropriated to help the unfortunate Americans out of Mexico, and I do not want to see it hampered by any amendment. I should like to see that bill pass now, and in order to hasten its passage I resume my seat with a disposition to avoid further delay.

Mr. SHIVELY. In the spirit of expediting action I express the hope that we may now have a vote on the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRADING AND INSPECTION OF GRAIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classifications of grain, and for other purposes.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator withhold that motion just for a moment to allow me to make a request?

Mr. SHIVELY. I withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, three days ago I submitted a resolution, being Senate concurrent resolution 342, which went over under the rule. I ask that it lie over until to-morrow without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the concurrent resolution referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire will lie over without prejudice.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHIVELY. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 35 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 24, 1914, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 23, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of justice, mercy, love, purity, peace, and good will, our hearts instinctively turn to Thee in this hour of sorrow and distress. Thou knowest that we are a peace-loving people; that war is abhorrent. And we most earnestly pray that Thou wilt intervene, that further bloodshed may be averted twixt us and our sister Republic, whose people have been rent and torn by internal strife—may they not be misled to oppose our just contentions—that peace and good will may speedily obtain; and we shall ascribe all praise to Thee in the spirit of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. ROTHERMEL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, during my absence from the House, a resolution (H. Res. 464) was brought up in the House to pay Katharine Kirby $1,200 for work she did in the room of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce, of which committee I am the chairman. On my return to Washington, in looking at the RECORD, I find that my character has been assailed by statements that I kept money belonging to the Government. On that proposition, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement to the House to clear away mistakes that were heaped upon me in my absence, and without any knowledge whatever.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, I was elected chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce in the Sixty-third Congress. In August, 1913, one of my secretaries left, and I was in need of stenographic help. At that time, August, 1913, Miss Kirby asked me for employment in my office. I told her that I had an official secretary, but that I would pay her $50 per month out of the official check, which I did. Miss Clara E. Young is my official secretary, and she has charge of the congressional offices at home. Miss Kirby agreed to accept $50 out of that check and do the work for me here in the offices in Washington. I divided the official check between two people, because at home the work is going on day in and day out, and in that way these two women have divided the check. I paid Miss Kirby $50 a month regularly until this resolution came up in the House. But what did I find when I came to Washington—and I simply make this statement, because I have served in this House for seven years and have never received a penny from anybody or from any source except that to which I was entitled. My heart is not black enough to take the money of this Government or to take the money of anybody else that I am not entitled to. Before I go on I desire to state that I had not the slightest intimation that a resolution would come up in the House of Representatives to pay this young lady $1,200. It is true the committee passed that resolution unanimously, Democrats and Republicans, that she should have $1,200 for the services she rendered, but if I had been here I would have stated that I had paid her seven times $50, which is $350, since August last.

When we had concluded our investigation of the seal industry of Alaska the committee called Miss Kirby in and offered a resolution, and unanimously agreed, Democrats and Republicans alike, that she should have $1,200 for her services. When I left for my home the resolution came to the Committee on Accounts, and from there it came to the House, and I had not the slightest knowledge it would come up here. Statements respecting the matter were made by a number of men in the House. I have looked over the list and find that they are nearly all lawyers, and I am absolutely astonished that a man should be attacked without any knowledge at all of what is going on, especially by men who practice law in the courts and who know that no one should be condemned without a hearing. Let me refer to a few statements here from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 6869, the RECORD of Saturday, April 18, 1914:

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. As a matter of fact, the service which she was rendering from August to December was that of a clerk to the chairman of the committee as a Member of the House.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I think not at all. This is true, and we might as well admit it: This money has been drawn by the chairman, both for his private secretary and for clerk to the committee, and has been paid to himself or paid to somebody else for service that was never rendered.

The gentleman charges me with drawing money for my private secretary, for the clerk of the committee, and this young woman, in whose behalf the resolution was offered, and she worked faithfully and true. The entire committee agreed that she should have the money, and somebody obtained the impression that I did not pay her any money for eight long months. I paid it absolutely, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. LLOYD, whether she did not come in and admit to him that I paid the money, after this trouble had occurred on Saturday?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, Miss Kirby and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ROTHERMEL, were in my office together the day before yesterday. Mr. ROTHERMEL then made the statement that he had up to that time paid her $350—$50 a month for seven months—and she admitted that she had received the $350. She said, however, that it was not paid regularly. Mr. ROTHERMEL admitted that he made two payments at one time; in other words, that it went over for one month. I believe that that is about the statement that was made.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Did not this young lady come before our committee the other day and testify to the fact that Mr. ROTHERMEL had paid her only two months' salary up to that time?

Mr. LLOYD. My recollection is that she did not make that statement before the committee, but the statement was made on the floor of the House here. If I remember, the statement was made by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. TOWNER; but the RECORD will show the fact. She stated before the committee that Mr. ROTHERMEL had paid her some money. My recollection is that she did not state the amount. She says she did not state the amount. I understand that others of the committee have the impression that she did state the amount, and that the amount was $100.

Mr. WOODRUFF. That is exactly my recollection of her statement to the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The money, however, the gentleman has paid the stenographer was his own money. He paid her the money out of his own pocket. Is not that true?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he will permit me, stated in her presence that the $50 a month which he paid was for services which she rendered him as private secretary, and the money was paid out of the $125 a month allowance for a private secretary.

Mr. SABATH. That is not the committee allowance?

Mr. LLOYD. Oh, no; this has nothing to do with the committee allowance at all, and it has nothing to do with the controversy before the House. In fact, the question before the House the other day was whether this woman should have $1,200 for services that she rendered the committee. This $50 a month is for services which she rendered to him as private secretary, which he paid her as private secretary, and was no part of the $1,200 which she was to receive from the committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I am sure, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri, that the committee had the opinion, because several members of the committee told me that they understood that the only payment which had been made to her had been the two payments of $50.

Mr. LLOYD. My own understanding about the matter was that up to that time she had only received $100 from him as private secretary.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Then the impression left on the House was that the allowance of $150 a month was to cover all the services she had rendered, but, as a matter of fact, now, as I gather it, she has been paid $50 a month, and the House allowed $150 a month in addition. Is that right?

Mr. LLOYD. That is right.

Mr. BARNHART. So she would receive $200 a month?

Mr. LLOYD. Let me explain that, if I have not made myself clear on this point as to my understanding of the matter. The committee, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROTHERMEL] is chairman, passed a resolution allowing this woman $1,200 for the services which she had rendered the committee. Mr. ROTHERMEL says, and so does each member of the committee, that the $1,200 which she was allowed by the resolution was a proper compensation for the services which she rendered the committee. It turns out that, in addition to the services which she rendered the committee, she rendered services to Mr. ROTHERMEL, and by the statements made on the floor of the House it appeared that he had only paid her for services $100; but it does not make any difference to the House whether he paid her $50 or $350, because the $1,200 was for services rendered to the committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I do not wish to take too much of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask a question I have in my mind. The thing that troubles me, and the particular thing I wish to know, is this: What became of the money that we appropriated to pay the clerk of the committee? Who got that?

Mr. LLOYD. Well, I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania will answer that question.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield further for a question? The intention of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce at the time that the committee voted this money to that young woman was that she did the work of the committee and also did the work of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. As a member of the committee, my understanding was this: After the work of the committee had been completed, or almost completed, the committee had a meeting——

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. Whose personal privilege is this?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROTHERMEL].

Mr. BUTLER. I insist my colleague ought to have a chance to make his statement.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to be perfectly willing for these other gentlemen to chip in. [Laughter.]

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I understood that the gentleman yielded. I was going to state further, as a member of the committee that voted this $1,200, the statement there was, and it occurs to me from the statement, and I am quite certain the other committee members will remember, that in addition to the committee work, which has been arduous, there was an arrangement between the chairman of the committee whereby he was to pay for work done for him as private work, and the work that would naturally be done by his clerk an additional $50 a month. Now, so far as the committee is concerned, as I understood it and as I understand it now, we paid absolutely no attention to the $50 a month, whether it had or had not been paid; that the allowance of $1,200 was for the work done for the committee. It did develop that she had put in many days double time; that she was unable to do the work in the daytime within reasonable hours, and she worked at the office at night and put in more hours during the daytime than committee clerks usually put in; but that $1,200 allowed to the young woman was for the work she did for the committee, regardless of the $50 a month, which, as I see it, has absolutely nothing to do with the fact whether or not it was paid. There seems to be some misunderstanding as to what the young woman might have said. I had the impression from her statement that the money was paid at irregular intervals, but I never made any inquiry into that, because I did not care how much she was paid in that way; her services were undoubtedly worth to the committee every dollar she was to receive.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Now, Mr. Speaker, it makes a great deal of difference to me whether I kept $50 a month of the Government's money, and that was stated in this House, and it was stated also that not only did I keep that, but that I drew the check of the clerk of the committee, as well as the private secretary's check, and kept the money. That would be next to a crime, and there is not a word of truth in it. It was referred to here in this House by a number of men who are lawyers, and they would put on me that I was keeping the Government's money, kept this girl out of any money for eight long months, when I have the receipts and the checks in my possession showing that the money was paid. Whether that has anything to do with the question of paying her $1,200 or not it has a great deal to do with me. I have been a Member among you for seven years, and this is the only instance in which I have been suspected of wrongdoing. In fact, I have a high regard for the membership of this House. I believe people are honest. My heart is not black, and therefore I am the last man to see black spots in other people's hearts.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Would there be any need for the employment of this young woman's services if the clerk of the committee who was provided for by the House was there to perform the duties that this young lady was called upon to perform?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this woman was employed in August, 1913, and the committee had no clerk until December, 1913.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the committee had a clerk at all?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Not until December, 1913.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the clerk ever appeared in the committee room?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes, sir. He appeared in the committee room.

Mr. MADDEN. When?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. In December. He was there all that month.

Mr. MADDEN. Has he been there since?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I will explain to the gentleman if he will allow me. Joseph M. Baker is as fine a young man as there is in the city of Washington. He was in the committee all of December and I think at the beginning of January. He said his health was not good. He asked me permission to visit his sister for about 10 days or 2 weeks in Ohio. He is there now. I was not going to cut him from the list when I found he was sick. He has as much sense in his little finger as some grown-up men have in their whole souls.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROTHERMEL] yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF]?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I do, Mr. Speaker. I want the truth to come out.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Do I understand from the last statement that you have been paying this clerk of the committee since December, and that he has rendered no service to your committee?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I stated to the House of Representatives that he was there all during December and I think a part of January, and asked leave of absence for 10 days or 2 weeks and went to see his sister in Ohio. He has reported to me that he would like to come back as soon as his health is restored.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I know; but do you mean to tell this House, Mr. ROTHERMEL, that you have been paying that committee clerk for five months when he has only rendered service for one month?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. The Government has been paying him. He was designated as clerk to the committee, and gets the checks and the money. He is a regular session clerk.

Mr. WOODRUFF. And yet your committee expects this House to assume the responsibility of paying still another clerk $1,200 for performing the work your committee clerk was supposed to perform?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. That was the unanimous consent of the committee—I submitted it, and the Republicans and the Democrats joined in—that that was an independent matter, so far as this seal investigation was concerned, and that she was entitled to the money.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will you inform the House what particular ailment is troubling this young man?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. On April 13, 1914, I received the following telegram:

> Please wire at my expense, as requested, if nothing but clerkship can be landed for the present, as doctor says operation is necessary, and I prefer to be in Washington.
> JOE BAKER.

I do not know what is wrong with the young man; but it is an official matter, and the work was done. I did a great part of the work that the clerk ought to do, but I did not mean to lay off Joseph M. Baker simply because he became ill, when he had asked leave of absence for 10 days on account of his health.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Yes; but he had leave of absence extended to him for 10 days, and he has been absent for 4 months.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. That is true, and I have explained it to the gentleman.

Mr. LOGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I will.

Mr. LOGUE. As I understand it, the first request was for 10 days' leave of absence to visit his sister. Subsequently he became ill. You were advised of that? He is on the pay roll, and you did nothing in the way of aiding a sick man to be stricken from the roll?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. That is what I said. I did not strike the man off.

Mr. LOGUE. You were anticipating the man's recovery, and that he would come back?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. LOGUE. And you were not going to take his pay away from him on account of his sickness?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No.

Mr. ADAIR. Is it not true that Members of Congress have been ill and have been away longer than this clerk has been away, and drew their salary for the time they were away?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I will let the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD speak for that.

Mr. TOWNER. Did you have a private secretary here, Mr. ROTHERMEL?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. As explained a while ago—I do not know whether the gentleman was here or not. Miss Clara Young, at home, has charge of the office there, and she gets this check and pays the girl in Washington out of the official check.

Mr. TOWNER. The payment is made, then, from the secretary's salary, is it?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Oh, no; I divide it up. I pay this young lady here, and send the check on to Miss Young for $75.

Mr. TOWNER. Did you receive the money also for the clerk's salary?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Not at first, but after he was ill I sent it on to him.

Mr. TOWNER. You sent it on to him?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. You have received the money, then, both for the private secretary's salary and the clerk's salary, making $250 a month?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes; I received it for them, but not as the gentleman put it in the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNER. I am just trying to find out about that, Mr. ROTHERMEL.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Just one moment——

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. When I read your statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I could not reach any other conclusion except that the gentleman from Iowa looked into his own heart and what he saw there he thought I was doing.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman, of course, must have felt hurt at the matter, and I am very sorry indeed that the matter arose. But we are trying to find out now, if we can, something regarding the facts of the matter. Then, you have been drawing $250 a month here and have had neither the service of the secretary, who was entitled to $125 a month, nor the service of a clerk, who was entitled to $125?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes; but I had reasons——

Mr. TOWNER. And all the work that has been done by anybody for the $250 received from the Government was done by this girl, who, you say, was paid $50 a month. Is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. She received nothing of that except the $50 that came out of Miss Young's check, who has charge of the congressional office in Reading. Now let me ask the gentleman a question. Where did you get the information that was submitted in the RECORD?

Mr. TOWNER. I told you a few minutes ago that I got it from the members of the committee, and I stated when I made the statements that I made them on information. The value of the gentleman's statement that he received this money in both of these instances is dependent upon whether the gentleman paid it out in these instances.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. When I say I paid it out, I paid it out. I paid out not only $250, but not less than $50 and $75 a month extra from my salary since I have been in Congress.

Mr. TOWNER. One more question. In view of the statement made here by the gentleman himself, that this money was received by him in both instances and under those circumstances, does not the gentleman think that he ought to have asked that an investigation be made in order that the facts may be ascertained in regard to the entire transaction?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I have no fear of an investigation.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not the purpose of the gentleman to ask for an investigation?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I have no fear of an investigation at all.

Mr. TOWNER. But you ought to ask for it.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I say it ought to be absolutely sufficient when I tell the gentleman my statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The clerk-hire check is made out to the Member himself. Of course the gentleman received the clerk-hire check himself?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No; that is made out to the clerk himself.

Mr. MANN. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am speaking of the clerk hire. I am not speaking of the clerk's salary. The clerk-hire check is paid directly to the gentleman?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The question was asked whether the gentleman received $250 a month. The check for the salary of the clerk of the committee is made out in the name of the clerk of the committee, is it not?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman ever cash any of those checks?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I will say this to the gentleman from Illinois: Mr. Baker sent a receipt to the document room, and I then indorsed the check and sent him on the money.

Mr. MANN. You received in the mail a check for the committee clerk, made out in the name of the committee clerk?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No.

Mr. MANN. That is what I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No; that is fixed up in the document room.

Mr. MANN. Not the document room——

Mr. ROTHERMEL. In the disbursing office, I should say.

Mr. MANN. That check is made out in the name of the clerk of the committee?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that he forwarded those checks.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No; I said——

Mr. MANN. What was the transaction?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. First Mr. Baker was here and got his own check, and after he went home he wrote to me that I should get his check and get it cashed and send him the money.

Mr. MANN. The check that the gentleman received, then, was not mailed. It was made out by the disbursing officer and it ran to Mr. Baker?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes. He sent the receipt, and I indorsed the check and sent him the money.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman did not cash any of those checks?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No.

Mr. MANN. You sent the check itself to Mr. Baker?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No; I indorsed it and sent him the money.

Mr. MANN. What do you mean by indorsing the check?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. He wrote letters to me that I should indorse the check and send the money to him, and I sent it on.

Mr. MANN. Why was it not just as convenient to send the original check to Mr. Baker himself as to cash it and send to him a new check?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. He asked me to do that, and the receipts are on file.

Mr. GOOD. I will ask the gentleman did he send this money to Mr. Baker by a draft or a check?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I sent it once by check, I think, and once I telegraphed it to him.

Mr. GOOD. You have the receipts, of course, for those payments that you made to him, have you?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I have not. I have daily expected him to come here.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I should like to get this thing straight in my mind. This is the second occasion on which I have listened to a discussion of it. The gentleman is chairman of a committee known as the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce. Is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And that committee has investigated the matter of pelagic sealing in Alaskan waters? Is that correct?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make his responses loud enough so that we may understand him back here. We can not hear a word that he says.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will please speak a little louder.

Mr. MURDOCK. This committee of yours has made an investigation in regard to the unlawful killing of seals in Alaskan waters? Is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And has made a report to this House that some one up there, if I remember correctly, the North American Commercial Co., the lessee of the Pribilof Islands, is liable to this Government on its bond? Is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. That is what the committee report.

Mr. MURDOCK. During the progress of this investigation did the gentleman hire a young lady as clerk of the committee here?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Only in this way: When I hired her at $50 a month I told her that there was work to be done here for the committee on this investigation that the gentleman has referred to in his question.

Mr. MURDOCK. You were not authorized by the committee to do that, were you?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I simply stated that I thought the committee would make an allowance to her.

Mr. MURDOCK. You stated that to her?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. But the committee made no allowance until the other day.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did you pay her out of the check you get monthly for $125, with the marginal notation upon it "clerk hire"? You paid that woman $50 a month out of that?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That was for his private work.

Mr. MURDOCK. I understand perfectly. You paid out of that same check $75 to Miss Young in Reading, Pa.?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Miss Young runs your office there. Is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes; and she attends to congressional work there every day in the year.

Mr. MURDOCK. So the full $125 was accounted for completely by the payment to Miss Kirby in Washington of $50 a month and to Miss Young in Reading of $75 a month?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Absolutely, with additional payments that I made out of my own pocket.

Mr. MURDOCK. The other day we were given to understand on the floor of the House that Miss Kirby had received but two payments of $50 each, or $100 in all, when, as a matter of fact, she had received $350. Is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that if this matter had not come up in my absence and without my knowledge it would have been easy for me to explain this, but I did not know that the resolution had been offered in the House until they told me on Monday morning.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, a final question. The committee which made this investigation had, besides these two women—one in Washington and one at Reading, Pa.—a third person as clerk, who received $125 a month under the law?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. No.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The committee in Washington did not have any young lady in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURDOCK. I mean the clerk of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce. There was a third person involved, a young man who was to receive $125 a month; is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. And that man's name was Baker?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Did he get the money?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. SAUNDERS. They have all got their money.

Mr. VARE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. VARE. Did I understand my colleague correctly to say that this young man who is now at home sick was here in January performing his work?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. He was here——

Mr. VARE. All of December and a part of January?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I think so.

Mr. VARE. Now, the fact remains that instead of being absent four or five months he has not been absent three months. So if he was paid for every day he was absent on account of sickness, he would be paid for less than three months' service?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I think there were two checks he did not draw himself, because he was not here.

Mr. BUTLER and Mr. WOODRUFF rose.

The SPEAKER. Will gentlemen give the gentleman from Pennsylvania a chance to answer one question before asking another?

Mr. VARE. The gentleman has answered my questions.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I should like to ask the gentleman to tell the House when he made these arrangements with Miss Kirby to pay her $1,200 for this work.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I never made any arrangement with Miss Kirby to pay her any money. When the committee met and the hearings were concluded and the report was read to the committee, some member suggested that we ought to pay the help that we had, and then I think it was the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] who made the first suggestion that Miss Kirby had done a whole lot of work for the committee, and I called her in, and then and there the resolution was passed that she should have $1,200 for the work she had done.

Mr. BUTLER. For the committee work she was to have $1,200. She was to have $50 for your work. Who complains that the money has not been paid to either one of these employees?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Not one of them. It came up in the House and it looked to me like an attack on me.

Mr. BUTLER. I should say decidedly that it was an attack on the gentleman, a man known all over the State for his absolute integrity and honesty. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it seems to me that one fact has not been emphasized which Members should bear in mind. I happen to have been the author of the resolution introduced requiring the investigation made by Mr. ROTHERMEL's committee into the operation of the Alaska seal leases. Now, I want to make a statement: For nearly three years the committee has been conducting a laborious and intricate and, I am glad to say, a successful investigation. During much of that time the committee—and gentlemen should keep in mind the difference between committee work and the Members' work—the committee was without a clerk. The work accumulated in that office to such an extent that, to my personal knowledge, being deeply interested in the work, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was at his office night after night until nearly midnight doing the work for which Congress had not appropriated money to pay a clerk. I am informed that there are committees of the House which, when they appoint a subcommittee to do investigating work, allow that subcommittee a clerk, a sergeant at arms, or a doorkeeper, or messenger. That work could not be any more laborious, any more continuous, than this work done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do not believe that any other investigation will prove more instructive, illuminating, or successful than the work that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROTHERMEL] and his committee have done, and it appears that the total cost to the Government for nearly three years' work is this disputed appropriation of $1,200, not for Mr. ROTHERMEL's work, but for the committee work.

It must be kept in mind, also, that Mr. ROTHERMEL continued the work of investigation while Congress has been in recess, when Congress deprived him of the committee clerk's compensation, and he put his hand into his own pocket to hire necessary clerical assistance.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. As I understand the situation, you as well as every other Member of Congress, have an allowance of $125 a month for clerk hire. Out of that $125 you appear to have paid two separate persons to do your individual clerical work, as it was entirely proper and competent for you to do. Every dollar of the $125 that is intended for your personal work has gone to the persons whom you employed. In addition you have paid out other amounts for this work. We are not concerned with the number of actual persons whom a Member employs to do his personal work. I understand further that your committee also had a clerk who under the law drew a definite salary, and every dollar of the salary to which that party was entitled, has been received by him.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. So far as the claim of the young lady for work done for the committee is concerned, that is quite a different proposition. This matter was passed up to the committee, and the committee in view of the facts, recommended that she receive for that work a certain amount. That recommendation was brought before the House, and the House agreed to pay the young lady the amount recommended.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes. I wish to say this, and to make it clear to the House, because it may not be distinctly understood, that these expenditure committees have no clerk until the regular session opens. When Miss Kirby came I had no clerk at all, and, as the gentleman from New Jersey states, I did most of the work day and night, in order to get through with it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And during the recess of Congress when you had no clerk.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will develop one fact further in this connection, and that is that so far as Mr. Baker is concerned, his is a committee, and not a personal question. Whether or not he should be paid, in view of the fact that he has been sick, is a matter that concerns the whole committee, and it was not up to the gentleman, as chairman, to decide the matter on his own responsibility.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I consider that it made no difference to the Government whether he was dropped or not. He was one of my constituents, and the committee had instructed me to name a clerk, and so I kept on expecting Mr. Baker to return. My colleagues know him to be as fine a young man as lives.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything about these check transactions; but I do want to say that during the Sixty-second Congress I had an office by the side of the office of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I know of my own knowledge that there is no Member of the House—certainly no investigating committee—that devoted more time to the duties of his office than did the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROTHERMEL]. From early morn until late at night—Sundays included—work was going on in that committee room. Often two, three, and four clerks were engaged; but who paid them I do not know. I do want to say, however, that I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been one of the most industrious, hard-working, conscientious Members of this House, and I believe every statement he has made to be absolutely true. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I am a Republican, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a Democrat. There is nothing political in common between us. I have listened to this discussion, however, until it has become almost unparliamentary, the gentleman from Pennsylvania having been so constantly referred to in the second person as to indicate that there is a personal attack upon him.

Under these circumstances, I want to say, as a Republican who has watched his colleague from Pennsylvania—a Democrat—through the whole of his career in Congress, that I do not believe for one moment that he would hocus-pocus this House or misappropriate one single dollar that was due to him or to some one in his employ. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been drawn into an unfortunate position at a time when a political campaign is being waged against him in his own district and within his own party. I do not, therefore, intend to sit silently here and see him personally assailed and his reputation questioned for partisan or political purposes. His own colleagues know him too well for that.

It seems to me that this statement is due by one who has had no political affiliations with the gentleman. I have not agreed with him politically, nor have I agreed with the findings of his subcommittee on the question of the fur-seal industry. It seems to me, if any fault was to be found with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in that matter, it was due to his overzealousness. He undertook to find fault with the Republican administration, and I think unjustly. But this personal assault upon him, even from his own side, seems to be beside the question, totally unfair, out of place, and unwarranted in a House made up of his own colleagues. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. Mr. ROTHERMEL, for the purpose of having your congressional work done you employed some one in your office here and some one in your office at Reading. Is that correct?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. And these two parties were paid out of your clerk's salary check?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. You required additional help, as I understand, for the purpose of having certain clerical duties performed for a committee of which you are the chairman?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I stated at the time that Miss Kirby was employed, when the investigation was going on, that there was work going on, and I stated that I thought the committee would pay her for the work she did for the investigation of the fur-seal industry.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. Then this money that was paid from time to time for clerical work for this committee was not retained by you, as I understand, but was given to the parties whom you believed were justly and legally entitled to it?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. And not one dollar was retained by yourself?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Not one dollar.

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania. Mr. ROTHERMEL, I want to say to your colleagues that I come from your congressional district, and in season and out of season, as a Republican, now a Progressive, I have fought you tooth and nail politically; but I do not hesitate to say, and I want to say here, with all of the emphasis I am capable of putting upon these words, that never by your friends and neighbors in the counties of Lehigh and Berks, in the State of Pennsylvania, have I ever heard your integrity questioned. [Applause.] As my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has said, there is a bitter contest being waged in your district, and, in the language of the street, if I may be permitted to apply it in your case, you are being made the "goat." I am sorry to see it, and I am glad, as a friend and neighbor, of the opportunity offered to rise at this time and say to your colleagues, who may not know you as long as I have known you, that your honesty is above reproach, and those who know you best and have known you all of these years would never, for one minute, believe that you were ever mixed up in any scandal reflecting upon your own honesty or concerned in any matter that would reflect upon the honesty of anyone else. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I have been much edified by the last two speakers and the sentiments they have expressed. Unfortunately, I do not come from the State of Pennsylvania, and I have had no previous acquaintance with Mr. ROTHERMEL or the reputation he bears. These two gentlemen have expressed their sentiments, one as a Republican and the other as a former Republican and now as a Progressive; but I want to say, as another Progressive and not as a Republican, that I am endeavoring to get at the facts in this case. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will answer the question I asked him some time ago, which he did not answer, and that is, will the gentleman tell the House when the arrangements were made with this young lady to do this work?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. When the hearings were concluded and the report had been read and passed by the committee.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Just when was that?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. That was probably four weeks ago. The hearings will show that.

Mr. WOODRUFF. And no arrangements were made as regards this $1,200 until four weeks ago?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Not at all.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Just what arrangements did you make with her as regards compensation?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I made no arrangements at all. When the matter came up in the committee, I said, "Miss Kirby is here now and we will call her in."

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman say that the committee employed this young lady to do this work without an understanding as to how much compensation she should receive for it?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. She was not employed. I simply stated to her, as I have repeatedly said to this House, when I agreed to pay her $50 a month, that there was work in this committee in this investigation and that I needed help, and I thought that the committee would pay for it.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman tell the House just when she began her work?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Last August.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Do you mean to tell the membership of this House that that young lady has been employed since last August up until four weeks ago without having any understanding as to what money she was to receive?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. She had no understanding until the committee had concluded its hearings, as I have said repeatedly here this morning.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Speaker, after hearing the statements I shall leave out of consideration altogether the Member's clerk hire, and consider merely the question of the committee clerk compensation. This lady did work for the committee without any understanding as to pay?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Yes.

Mr. LOGUE. As I understand it, the clerk of the committee, Mr. Baker, was away. He was taken sick. With no arrangements whatever as to clerk pay, the work of the committee was carried on and the work of the committee was brought up to date. The clerk hire for the committee was paid, and Mr. Baker has been in receipt of his salary, a sick man, instead of being cut off the pay roll. The clerk work was done, no matter who did it, and the chairman of the committee, either in hours or after hours, had the work done and a report was made back to the general committee, and the general committee recommends that the sum of $1,200 shall be paid to this lady as compensation. It strikes me, therefore, that we are confronted with merely this condition: That the work of the committee has been done by some one, no matter by whom; that the regular clerk of the committee is sick; and that the committee did not stop to consider the question of whether a sick person should be cut off the pay roll and some one else be put on in his place; but having an active, earnest chairman, who saw the work, who brought it up to date, after it was brought up to date the committee recommends compensation for the person who performed the work.

It strikes me we have gotten off into a wide, broad scope. It is simply a question if this work was done and if this work is one which called for the compensation which the committee in their wisdom recommended, and we are going a great deal out of our line over to a point of asking whether a man who was acting for the committee and did the proper clerical work is reported as sick to the chairman of the committee and the inquiry made whether or not he was cut off on the exact day that he was incapacitated. My opinion is we would never be so very quick as regards ending the expenditure of our money with our own employees who were taken sick, and I do not think we ought to strain ourselves to do it as regards the public money.

Mr. SAUNDERS and Mr. WOODRUFF rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield, if to anybody?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I can not yield any further.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman just one question?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Just one.

Mr. SAUNDERS. So far, as the work that this young lady did for the gentleman's committee, is under consideration, I understand that she did the work, and took her chances of compensation first with the committee, and then with the House. The question of compensation was put up to the committee. The committee made its recommendation. This recommendation was then put up to the House, and the House, in view of the facts which were developed, allowed her a certain compensation as a quantum meruit.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I wish to say to this House, and state that I will not yield any further, that my regard for the membership of the House of Representatives has always been the highest, and I wish to state here now that I appreciate the sentiments which were expressed on the part of my colleagues, Republicans and Democrats alike, to take that stain from my character. It was unfortunate and unjust, as I felt, to take the matter up in my absence. If I had been here, these facts would have been before the House before that resolution was passed, and I wish to state in conclusion that I have not changed my opinion, and I feel that when a man is attacked he is perfectly safe in the hands of the Members of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes, particularly for the purpose of explaining the position that the young lady is placed in in reference to this matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we have had enough of this, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. WATKINS. I will be glad if the gentleman from Illinois will reserve his right to object.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman can get time in general debate on the naval bill. I think we have had enough of this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

SAMUEL MEISENBERG (MARTEN).

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, shortly after the first news was flashed from Vera Cruz that for the purpose of upholding the honor and dignity of the American flag our fleet had commenced the taking of that port, we have been informed that in that cause four American boys have lost their lives. Only three names of those who have fallen in upholding the respect and honor of our country were given. The fourth was designated as "name unknown." But he is not unknown any longer. His name was Samuel Meisenberg, who, however, enlisted under the name of Samuel Marten. He was a boy of Jewish parentage, from my district of the city of Chicago. This brave and courageous young man enlisted under the assumed name, as many other young men of foreign birth have done, in order to escape the prejudice which frequently exists in certain branches of the service, and which I hope and trust will be speedily eliminated, especially when it has been demonstrated again and again that it is uncalled for and unjustifiable.

Though I deplore exceedingly that any lives had to be lost, and that more may yet be lost, still I must at this time admit that I am gratified that among the first four who have given up their lives for the honor of our country is a boy of Jewish birth, of my own city, and that two of the other three young men are of foreign-born parents. This clearly proves, as I have always maintained, that the foreign-born people are, and always will be, appreciative of our free institutions, and are ready and willing to defend them with their lives as readily and willingly as any who are able to point with pride to a long line of American ancestors.

Though I am personally strongly opposed to war, and hope and trust that it will not be necessary for us to take further and more stern measures in order to compel respect for our flag and our country and to convince the Mexican people that the step which we have taken is in the best interests of their unfortunate, war-ridden country, torn by internal factions and strife, still, if war must come, I feel confident that our country—that my country—can depend with equal safety and confidence upon those citizens of foreign birth fully as well as upon those more fortunate American-born citizens.

This is borne out by the very first report received from the scene of activities at Vera Cruz, just as it is borne out by the very first reports which reached us at the opening of the Spanish-American War, when the name of a Jewish young man, Maurice Jusiti, a sergeant, of San Francisco, led the list of those who gave up their lives in the Philippine Islands for the cause of his country.

Further proof of my contention and my confidence in the foreign-born citizens is found in the fact that among the names of the 20 young men who have been seriously wounded in the taking of Vera Cruz I find the names of 2 other Jewish boys—Nathan Schwartz, of New York, and George Maurice Davidson, late of the city of Chicago—clearly demonstrating that my city and my State, which I have the honor in part to represent, and my people and boys of foreign-born citizens of all nationalities are now at the front ready and willing, as I have stated, to defend and protect with their lives the honor and dignity of our country and our flag.

Notwithstanding this, we will find some gentlemen on the floor of this House questioning the patriotism of those who have been admitted as aliens to our shores.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time in our history that the Jewish people and the foreign-born citizens have demonstrated that they are always ready and willing to take up arms in the cause of the land of their adoption.

When this same port of Vera Cruz was taken in 1847 it was the father of my colleague, Mr. LEVY, of New York, Capt. J. Phillips Levy, who was one of the first to land and who was made captain of the port by Maj. Gen. W. J. Worth.

The Jewish citizens have at all times displayed earnest devotion, faithful service, courage, and bravery in the defense of their country. They took part in the earliest struggle for independence, and we continue to find their names linked with those who are struggling to solve the mighty problems which so nearly concern our Nation.

Historical data will show that a very large number of them have aided in every conceivable way not only on the battle field but in a financial way, many of them having come forward with their entire wealth to aid the Continental Army in the hours of its greatest need.

Everyone who is acquainted with the struggle for our independence must be familiar with the great service rendered by Hayn Solomon, who was a friend of Gen. Washington, fellow countryman and associate of Gen. Pulaski, and friend of Kosciusko. Not only did he give his valuable services, but he sacrificed his entire fortune for the cause.

At some future day I shall, with the permission of this House, give a list of the many hundreds of Jewish and other foreign-born citizens, soldiers, sailors, and marines who have served our country with distinction both as privates in the ranks and as officers in our war for independence, in the War of 1812, and in all subsequent conflicts, hoping thereby to show that they are not neglectful of their duty toward their country, but are desirous of serving it in times of war as well as in times of peace.

Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I was handed a new list of the dead and wounded, and again find in that list of honor the names of L. O. Friede, another Jewish boy, and Frank Devorich-Drovak, a Bohemian-American boy.

Among those seriously wounded appear the names of H. J. Kaplan, W. Powkowski, H. E. Boyle, Louis Kwapich, M. Fitzgerald, and Harry J. Reed, of Chicago, which demonstrates that my city has so far furnished its quota of those brave men who have fallen in the very first struggles in the cause of our country and that the names of the Jewish boys head the list of the dead and wounded, and the brave Irish, German, Bohemian, and Polish-American people are giving in ungrudging measure their blood in the cause of their adopted country and can be depended on, come what may.

Mr. DALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the courage of one John F. Schumacher, a resident of the fourth congressional district of the State of New York, who was one of the four boys just referred to by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], who lost his life day before yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to address the House for one minute for the purpose of reading a letter from a Spanish-American, called Mexican here in Washington, relative to the opening of the war——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, all of these matters can come up in general debate on the naval bill, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14034, making appropriations for the support of the Navy.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14034, the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what length of time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish to be recognized?

Mr. BUTLER. Will you please inform me how much time is left to be consumed on the Republican side of the House? I have been absent for two or three days and my mind has been filled with other things.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] has used 2 hours and 18 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore 2 hours and 42 minutes remain?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's arithmetic is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank you.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] use some of his time now.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], a member of the committee.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I doubt the wisdom of the Navy Department in seeking to build all naval vessels in Government navy yards regardless of cost or length of time in completion. From a strictly business standpoint the proposition is not a good one.

The department continues to call for public bids, as required by law, but in competition with these bids made by our shipbuilders in good faith navy yards are permitted to submit (usually in secret) so-called estimates of the cost of construction of the vessel in question in a Government navy yard. These "estimates" are so irresponsible and inaccurate that they have been made the subject of a proposed amendment to the naval bill introduced by Senator LODGE, which amendment aims to fix the responsibility upon some officer in authority at the navy yard where the estimate is made. This amendment reads as follows:

> Estimates of costs prepared at navy yards equipped for the construction of such vessels shall be certified to as follows by the officers preparing such estimates:
> "I certify that this estimate is sufficient to cover the cost of the vessel completed in accordance with the contract plans and specifications, including the customary contingencies, and, further, that these estimates, as approved by the chiefs of the bureaus concerned, shall be opened and made public at the time appointed for the opening of competitive bids: Provided further, That in case the actual cost of a vessel built in a navy yard shall exceed the estimate submitted when the work was authorized, that fact shall be entered on the record of all officers of the Navy concerned."

That navy-yard construction is vastly more expensive than the cost of similar work in a private yard has been demonstrated time and time again, and, furthermore, it is admitted by the naval authorities at this time. For instance, in the table prepared by the Navy Deparment and appended to the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy at this session, which table shows the relative cost of construction of the different types of naval vessels, first, in a private shipyard, and, second, in a Government navy yard, it is seen that a battleship which would cost $14,823,410 in a private shipyard would cost $16,873,410 in a Government navy yard, a difference of about 13 per cent in favor of the private yard.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that in estimating the price in the private yards a great sum is carried for naval officers and others who would be paid anyway if we did not build a battleship, and, as far as the expense of the Government is concerned, it would not really be as high as $16,000,000?

Mr. BROWNING. It is not so in this case. That is the construction of the vessel.

This same relative difference in cost between the private and Government yards runs through the estimates of the various types of naval vessels. The table referred to will be found on page 848 of the hearings before the House Committee on Naval Affairs at this session.

While this "estimate" admits this 13 per cent of increase in cost of navy-yard construction over the price in a private yard, the experience of the Navy Department as reported to Congress where ships of identical types were built simultaneously in a navy yard and a private yard shows that the real difference in cost is even greater than disclosed by the estimates found in the table just referred to.

In the case of the colliers Prometheus and Vestal, built in a Government navy yard, these vessels, according to the chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, cost the Government $1,150,000 in round numbers, while in private yards, Mr. PADGETT stated, the ships could have been produced for $890,000, a difference of $260,000.

Mr. PADGETT has also stated on the floor of the House that the battleship Louisiana, built in a private yard, cost $7,426,000, as against her sister ship Connecticut, built at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, for $7,911,000, something like $500,000 difference in cost. These facts will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, issue of May 28, 1912, pages 7344–7345, volume 48, part 7, Sixty-second Congress, second session.

The battleship Florida, built in Government yard, cost $6,295,137; the cost of her sister ship Utah, built by contract, was $4,145,228. Both of these vessels were authorized in the naval act approved May 13, 1908.

I am speaking of these costs exclusive of armor and armament.

The fact is that the exact cost of a vessel built in a Government navy yard is very difficult of ascertainment, and this statement brings us back to a consideration of the so-called "estimates" of the cost of the construction of a vessel which are placed in competition with actual bids submitted by shipbuilding companies. Our present chairman of the Naval Committee of the House remarked in a recent hearing:

> The bids submitted by the navy yards are simply estimates; and if the work is not done within their estimate there is no recourse or obligation on them; we just have to appropriate more money. * * * It is a question whether they can carry out their estimated figure.

As pointed out, Mr. Chairman, this tendency to build naval vessels in navy yards has apparently become a fixed policy under the present administration of the Navy Department, and that the department now has ample authority to proceed with navy-yard construction without the necessity for any enlargement of that authority is evident from the fact that the greater portion of the naval vessels authorized in last year's naval act has been placed under construction in the various navy yards throughout the country.

The battleship authorized is being built in the New York Navy Yard; the supply ship is to be built in the Boston Navy Yard, the transport in the League Island Navy Yard, and one of the four submarines at the Portsmouth (N. H.) Navy Yard. This shows that the Department has ample authority already to carry on its policy of building in Government yards, but not content, it is reaching out for further powers which would close the doors on private plants, except when the Government yards are so stocked up with work that they could not handle any further orders. It is true that they hold out a saving grace in a clause which provides that when contract costs are less in private plants than costs in such Government plants, then the Government plants may not be given the work; but as these Government costs are determined by navy-yard "estimates," there is little likelihood that the private yards will receive any considerable amount of Government work under this arrangement.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent a district in which is located one of the largest and best shipbuilding plants in this or any other country, in which is invested nearly $12,000,000 and which employs from 5,000 to 5,600 persons.

Just across the Delaware is the Cramp Shipbuilding Co., with about $15,000,000 invested, and employing some 4,500 men, many of whom live in my city.

Numerous other large plants in the country in which millions of money is invested, employing thousands of men, must share the fate of the two concerns in which I am so deeply interested if the Government pursues the policy advocated in certain sections of this naval bill, for I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that private plants can survive if all Government contracts are taken from them. There is not sufficient private work to justify their existence. Now, a very serious question arises: What is to become of the millions of dollars invested in these great establishments; and, worse yet, what is to become of the thousands of employees depending upon them for their daily wages?

Not only does this administration propose to build all our ships in Government yards, but they also propose to enlarge the powder plant in Maryland, in addition to running the same at its full capacity—three shifts of 8 hours each, or the whole 24 hours; and, further, to build an armor-plate plant.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DIES). Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. I will.

Mr. MOORE. Has the gentleman made any estimate of the number of people dependent upon the 5,000 employees at work in his yard?

Mr. BROWNING. Well, I should say there are about 20,000 people.

Mr. MOORE. Would not the average be about five persons to one workman?

Mr. BROWNING. Well, then, it would be about 25,000 people.

In the first district of New Jersey is located two plants manufacturing dynamite and smokeless powder; one of them—the smokeless-powder plant—manufactures powder exclusively for the Government. In these two plants there are employed from 1,600 to 2,000 people, and if the Government decides to enlarge the powder plant at Indian Head I am advised that one of the plants in my district will be closed and the other seriously affected.

Mr. Chairman, from the considerations which have been pointed out it is clearly in the Government's interest, and a matter of justice to the private shipyards and other plants of this country, to strike out the section of the naval bill seeking to enlarge the department's authority.

We need our navy yards with their splendid equipment and magnificently trained artisans and workmen, but we also need the efficient and prompt service rendered by the private establishments. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman's time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. It has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Then he has no time to turn back?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, I arise only for the purpose of getting in the RECORD a letter from some Spanish-Americans, commonly called Mexicans, in the State of New Mexico, with reference to the war with Mexico. I do this with some pride, because I have lived for 30 years among those people and know their loyalty to our flag. They served in the Civil War between the States and in the Spanish-American War, and though they are sometimes referred to mistakenly as "Mexicans," yet for loyalty to our flag they are not surpassed by German-Americans, for instance, or any other class of citizens in this Union of near or remote foreign descent. This is the letter:

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., April 14, 1914.

Hon. H. B. FERGUSSON, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Mexican situation looks serious now. It seems that the patience of President Wilson is about exhausted. He has been right from the beginning and he is right now.

When the War of the Rebellion broke out, in 1861, my father was one of the very first in New Mexico to offer his services to President Lincoln. He promptly received a commission, and raised a regiment of volunteers, and for two years and more rendered distinguished service to his country—his adopted country. Myself, my brother, Ireneo L. Chaves, and my boy, Amado, jr., are native-born American citizens, and I wish you would offer to the President our services. My brother and I are not too old and my boy—17 years—is not too young to fight under the glorious flag of our country—the American flag.

Just think for a moment what the condition of New Mexico would be if we did not belong to the United States. It would be deplorable. We are duly grateful to Almighty God that we are native-born American citizens.

If we can be of any service, we will report for duty on a moment's notice.

Yours, truly,

AMADO CHAVES.
IRENEO L. CHAVES.
AMADO CHAVES, Jr.

I would like to add that I have been asked occasionally, since the present situation became acute, how the Mexicans of New Mexico felt in this emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERGUSSON. I have asked unanimous consent to insert this letter in the RECORD in answer to such inquiries as that.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE].

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE, yesterday called the attention of the House to the fact that among the first offerings on behalf of country made at Vera Cruz was a young man of the city of Philadelphia, George D. Poinsett.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I was not present at the time to join with my colleague in the tribute paid, but I was at that particular time at the Navy Department trying to procure information concerning the return of the boy's remains, so that I might assist in assuaging the grief into which his family was plunged.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent the district in which the young man lived, and while it is not for any of us to seek glory out of the misfortune that enters the homes of others, yet it is our place to pay the tribute that is due in the hope that public utterance may to a degree lessen that personal sorrow which has come into the home of our fallen hero.

He, the youngest of a family of 11 children, an ambitious boy, offered his services to his country when but 17 years of age. In time of peace he was ready to give the best that was in him for his country's progress. In time of trouble his love of country did not lessen, but the ardor of youth fanned the flames of patriotism, and he cheerfully went forth to protect his country's rights and to uphold his country's flag.

While we direct our thoughts to the glory incident to the sacrifice of this young man we must not be unmindful of the home that has been depleted and of the father and mother who looked with loving and ambitious hope for the advance of this their youngest child. We must center our thoughts upon it and consider the training and association incident to it, where the lesson taught the youth has been so fruitful as to make him aware of the duty he owes to the great country that protects us and assures to us the preservation of the rights and privileges to which we are entitled.

This youth was of the flower of the country, a boy, manhood's years not come upon him, yet in the springtime of life, he left his home and joined with other valiant boys in the service of his native land. His conduct is a tribute to the sterling worth of the American home, and a tribute to the sterling qualities of the father and mother who guided and directed him. His death will keep his memory green in the hearts of our people for all time.

Words of mine, Mr. Chairman, can not restore, nor can anything restore, to the father and mother the boy who has been snatched away at a time of life when their hopes and ambitions were centered on him. Words of mine can not lessen the grief into which his death has plunged the family of which he is a part; but it is well, Mr. Chairman, that in the Halls of this, the greatest legislative body on the earth, a word of tribute should be uttered, and that proper recognition should be given to this young hero and to the home from which he came.

The names of great generals are preserved by history. Let us not be unmindful of the boy in the ranks, who makes an offer just as high and just as great. Let us remember that he does this at a time of life when all seems bright to him, when neither care nor trouble dim the anticipations of his youth, when life is attractive and hope makes living a thing to be desired.

Shafts and monuments may be erected in future years to the memory of those who have commanded and those who have fallen, but in the records of this House should appear a tribute paid to the boy whose remains lie to-day on foreign shores, who made the sacrifice that can not be exceeded that the principles for which our Government stands might be upheld. [Applause.]

And while nothing can fill the void in the home, from this reflection may come a sweet consolation to the family saddened by his death, that there was a glory in his mission, a patriotism in his undertaking, and heroism in the tragic termination of his young career. Well may we say of him, loving country, he loved its people; realizing what his country stood for, he knew his duty and performed it, and doubtless felt in his young heart that his work would be the cause of joy to the father and mother whom he loved.

When the history of these days shall be written, when the heroic deeds of Army and Navy officers shall be described, let us not forget that a home in Philadelphia's suburbs contributed just as generously to the welfare of the country, and that a loving father and mother made a sacrifice as great when the valiant, courageous, noble youth fell upon the soil of Mexico. Let these words uttered here, preserved as they will be for all time, perpetuate the memory of George D. Poinsett. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], and will yield 30 minutes if he desires.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to direct my remarks to the naval appropriation bill. As a member of the committee I am very well satisfied, and I sincerely hope that it will pass just as it has been handed to the House. I do desire, however, to call attention to three bills now in the hands of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, each of them having for their desire the conservation of the beef supply of the country, with the ultimate intention, of course, of reducing the cost of living.

At a national convention of meat packers recently held in Chicago several members of that association expressed an opinion that unless some remedial legislation was enacted by Congress, or unless the farm and cattle growers were educated to the idea of raising more cattle and preventing the slaughter of calves, beefsteak would soon be a dollar a pound, and that this rich, red meat so necessary for the building up of the brain and brawn of our great country would become a delicacy for the rich only to enjoy.

Realizing the great necessity of Government action in this direction, Secretary Lane recently announced that Indians on the Fort Hall Reservation in Idaho are to be encouraged in the raising of more live stock, and that he had recommended to the President that $20,000 of the available balance of the $25,000 in the Treasury to the credit of the Fort Hall Indians be expended in the purchase of bulls, cows, heifers, and horses. I am told that this reservation is now caring for some 4,000 cattle, although there is plenty of land for 15,000 head of stock.

Subsequent to this announcement a certain distinguished Member of the United States Senate suggested that the Government proceed on a systematic plan of stocking all of the forest preserves and Indian reservations with beef cattle and that United States soldiers and Cavalry be used as cowboys.

I am merely directing attention to these incidents to show that there is much diversified agitation toward the conservation of our beef supply before calling your attention to the three bills now in the hands of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, one of which was introduced by my good friend from Michigan, Mr. HAMILTON, known as House bill 1818, the substance of which prevents the transportation of any live calf "not accompanied by its mother, unless the same is 6 weeks old or over," and this bill, I believe, is intended largely as a humane measure, to prohibit the shipment of very young calves without their mothers and the further desire to improve the supply of veal.

House bill 8481, introduced by my distinguished friend, Judge ADAMSON, prohibits the slaughter or interstate transportation for beef purposes of "any female calf, heifer, or cow under 7 years of age, or any male calf under 2 years, or the carcass or flesh of any such animal."

This bill, I think, is patterned largely after the law now existing in Argentina, and may bring about the desired results. I am not so sure that I agree with the judge on the age limit of 7 years for female stock prescribed by his bill, but if his committee, after careful consideration, decides that a regulation of this sort would be in the interest of the public generally, I shall very gladly assist in its passage. The only other bill before the committee is House bill 7969, introduced by myself, which prohibits the interstate shipment or slaughter of beef cattle under 2 years of age for food purposes; and it is really immaterial to me which bill is recommended for passage just so long as something is done in the nature of a step forward.

I recall very distinctly how many Members of the House during the discussion of the last tariff bill called attention to the vanishing beef supply of the country and the argument that free cattle and free meats would very quickly make up for this tremendous shortage, which is now costing the people millions of dollars per annum in the advance of the price of beef; and only a short time ago Secretary Redfield, while addressing a Connecticut audience of business men, said that "the fall of prices has already begun," and his reference to the increasing imports of Argentine beef was most gratifying, and I find that importation of beef and veal from there has increased from nothing previous to October 1, 1913, when the free tariff bill went into effect, to nine and one-half million pounds in December and 9,000,000 pounds in January of this year. Australia's shipments of beef have increased from nothing to 3,000,000 pounds a month. Canada is sending a million pounds a month, Mexico a couple of hundred thousand pounds, and little Uruguay in February sent us two and one-half million pounds of frozen beef.

The freight rate on fresh beef from South American ports is about three-fourths of a cent per pound, while the rates in this country run up from one-half cent to 2 cents a pound, plus the refrigeration, depending on the distance.

Has anyone heard of the price of beef being lowered? On the contrary, the Department of Agriculture issued a bulletin on February 7, 1914, wherein it is admitted that the free tariff on foodstuffs, at least so far as the beef supply is concerned, has been very disappointing, and while the imports have increased beyond all expectation, still the price remains the same, so that it can not be said that the consumer is reaping any direct profit from the tariff reduction on meats, while the amount lost to the United States Treasury—and that means the taxpayers generally—in the reduction of the tariff amounts to more than half a million dollars a month. It is but prudent to ask if the consumer does not reap the benefit of this six or seven million dollars a year on account of the tariff reduction, who does? I believe I am safe in saying that the Beef Trusts, operating in Kansas City, St. Joseph, Omaha, St. Louis, Sioux City, and Chicago, are the sole beneficiaries, and their control of the meat markets of the world must be met by some form other than the reduction of a tariff which up to the present has merely resulted in further increasing the dividends for these great corporations.

Just now there are nine establishments for slaughtering, freezing, and exporting of meats located in or near Buenos Aires, Argentina, and five of these companies are owned or operated by the American Beef Trust, owning big establishments in different parts of the United States, many of which are not running 50 per cent of their capacity merely because the packer shows no desire to purchase in the American market any more than is absolutely necessary, when he can get what he wants from foreign markets at the hands of cheap labor and cheap transportation under a free tariff.

It stands to reason that they will ship to themselves from South America, Canada, and Mexico only such quantity of beef as will not cause a glutting of the markets and a reduction in price or an interference with their annual dividends. They consign to themselves millions of pounds of meat to be sold here, not in competition with American meats, but at the prevailing market price for beef that has been raised and transported at a much higher price than the imported article, so that I hope I will not be accused of playing politics when I say that the recent tariff bill, so far as meats are concerned, is now paying the Beef Trust more than one-half million dollars a month, and this amount can be increased at the will and option of the packers.

We are told that Russia has been sending agents here to study our food problem and to arrange for beef shipments, so that you may expect an announcement from Secretary Redfield almost any day calling attention to great prospective imports of beef from there, in which the consumer is going to share the benefits with the packer, and the fall of prices predicted months ago is now about to occur, and this cry will probably be maintained until after the next election, when the Department of Agriculture will be forced to again admit that, notwithstanding the tremendous increase in imports, the price of foodstuffs still continues to climb.

Shipments of beef from Australia have increased from nothing prior to the passage of the free-trade tariff bill to three and one-half million pounds in January of this year, and in this connection I desire to call your attention to the fact that Isaac M. Hodgekinson, the Armour & Co. agent at London, was in Chicago a few months ago, and at that time a campaign in Australia was decided on. By campaign I mean that it was decided to do everything in the power of the packing companies' millions to get control of the Australian beef situation before it has developed into a competitive factor. And right here I might add that Swift & Co., of Chicago, are getting their packing plant at Brisbane, Australia, ready to begin slaughtering in September of this year. Armour & Co. have also secured a site for a plant there, but are at present using the Government meat works at Adelaide for slaughtering purposes.

This condition merely shows that packers are alert to the advantage given them in recent tariff legislation, and that they intend to control imports into this country just so long as imports are desired. And it is now up to Congress to enact legislation that will make our country an exporter of beef and foodstuffs rather than an importer.

In many instances 50 per cent of the cattle coming into the Chicago markets for slaughtering purposes are picked up by farmers in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan, and retransported to their farms to be fattened up and again returned to the markets in Chicago only to compete in price with cheap Mexican, Canadian, and South American products. And as this particular competition is controlled entirely by the packer, and his shipments to himself are gauged according to the market, there can be no wonder at the high prices of meats. And this condition will prevail until we have an adequate supply of beef cattle, and we return to our once prosperous condition when large shipments of beef left American ports for Europe and Asia.

In 1906 we exported 584,000 head of beef cattle, while in the year 1913 we exported less than 25,000 head, or a decrease in that time of nearly 100 per cent. If these figures, coupled with the increase in imports of beef, mean anything at all, they mean that within the lifetime of practically every man on the floor of this House beefsteak will be a dollar a pound, and most of it will be imported into this country from our neighbors to the north and south of us.

The number of beef cattle in this country in 1907 was 52,000,000, and these have decreased so rapidly that on January 1 of this year we have but 36,000,000 head, or a decrease in six years of more than 30 per cent. Now, it does require an expert mathematician to understand the seriousness of this situation. A rapidly decreasing beef supply on one hand and a rapidly increasing population on the other readily accounts for sirloin steak being 71 per cent higher than in the 10-year period between 1890 and 1900, while round steak has increased 103 per cent; rib roast, 73 per cent; pork chops, 122 per cent; bacon, 128 per cent; smoked hams, 82 per cent; lard, 68 per cent.

New foundations must be constructed upon which to rebuild the cattle industry of the country, and I really believe that legislation of this sort is of vastly greater importance than much of the legislation that is daily taking up the time of Congress.

Of course I realize that farmers never regard themselves as having a mission to supply the public with beef at a low price, and in many instances their calves are sold, not because they have not the space nor the feed to keep them, but because of the little ready money that the sale of a calf brings.

On April 8 there arrived at the Chicago stockyards for slaughter 6,000 calves. Think of it, 6,000 calves in one day, many of them from 1 to 7 days old.

Just the other day the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] received a letter from a firm of packers calling attention to the slaughter of 9,000 calves from 3 to 6 weeks old in Knoxville last year.

During the year 1911, 8,000,000 calves were slaughtered in the United States, furnishing about 560,000,000 pounds of poor, watery, unwholesome human food. If my bill had been a law at that time and those 8,000,000 calves had lived until to-day, they would have produced 9,000,000,000 pounds more of good red beef than the market now affords. With this additional beef supply every man, woman, and child in your district and mine would enjoy their beef at least once every day instead of once a week as many of them do now.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I do not know that I have even seen the bill that the gentleman speaks of. Will it be contained in the gentleman's remarks?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes. I do not know that the gentleman from North Dakota was here when I started to talk and referred to the conditions surrounding my bill. The substance of it is that it prevents the interstate shipment of cattle under 2 years old for beef purposes, the idea being that if a calf is allowed to grow to maturity our stock of beef cattle will be increased thereby.

In many instances now calves are killed as quickly as the milk coming from the mother is fit to use for food purposes. They are hit on the head, and the skin only is sold in the public market, while the carcasses in many instances are canned and sent to our big cities marked "canned chicken." That fact was brought out by the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It was also brought out that thousands and thousands of calves die each year from starvation between the loading platform and the slaughterhouse, because they are shipped at such a young age, without proper food and proper care, and they die of starvation on the way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not true that in some States they have a law fixing the limit on the age at which calves may be killed? Is not that so in Illinois?

Mr. BRITTEN. It is only conditional in Illinois. A calf can not be used for food purposes in Illinois if it is younger than 6 weeks of age. But of course the National Government has no control over a situation of that sort. We can simply prevent the killing and shipment for food purposes in interstate commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman's bill would not prohibit the shipping of calves from points in Illinois to the Chicago market, but it would regulate the shipment outside of the State?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes. My bill has no control over purely State business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And to make your bill fully effective there ought to be State legislation to the same effect?

Mr. BRITTEN. Assuredly; in every State of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not interrupt because I disagree with him. I agree with him thoroughly.

Mr. BRITTEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think it was two years ago that a bill passed the House prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of immature veal. Did that bill become a law?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will say to the gentleman that it did not become a law. That is the Hamilton bill, which, I understand, was recently rereferred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is largely a humane measure, and prohibits the shipment of calves under 3 weeks of age unless accompanied by their mothers.

Mr. MURDOCK. Was that passed?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. It was favorably reported, but it was not passed.

Mr. MANN. It was objected to on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MURDOCK. There was a long discussion of it, as I remember, and I thought it had passed.

Mr. BRITTEN. That was the bill introduced by Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MANN. Take a dairy farm, where cows are kept for the purpose of producing milk and where now they knock male calves on the head——

Mr. BRITTEN. And the females as well.

Mr. MANN. Well, as a rule, not. But does the gentleman think there is any way of compelling the dairymen to raise their calves when it costs more to raise them than they are worth?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. The gentleman knows and I know that there is no way for either the State or the National Government to compel a man to raise a calf if he can not sell it or if he does not want to. It is his property, and he can do with it as he pleases. But we can prevent the interstate shipment of that poor food, and we can prevent the interstate shipment of any calves if we please, I think.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's proposition would entirely cut out, as I understand it, the use of veal?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; it would not prevent the farmers of Illinois, for instance, from selling their calves for food purposes within the State.

Mr. MANN. I mean if it were made thoroughly effective in interstate commerce.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; anything under 2 years of age.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. As a matter of fact, would not the most of the States follow the lead of the General Government in this as in nearly every other matter? An act of this kind, passed here, would probably be followed up by State legislatures forbidding intrastate commerce in that commodity?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I do not think that would be the effect. I think the States would enact legislation preventing the slaughter for food purposes of very young calves, but they certainly would not prevent the shipment of calves of any mature age from the farm to the local market within the confines of a particular State. Inside of that point, of course, the National Government has no jurisdiction.

If those 8,000,000 calves had been allowed to live two years, they would have produced 320,000,000 pounds of hides, which in turn would have made sole leather for 224,000,000 pairs of shoes.

It is said by some who are opposed to my bill that all farmers are not in position to raise their calves. That may be true of a very small percentage, but the majority of them could raise all their calves and then have feed to spare, if they would farm scientifically or properly.

Germany's soil has been tilled for a thousand years, and she is now raising 35 bushels of wheat per acre to our 15 bushels, 61 bushels of oats per acre to our 29 bushels, 41 bushels of barley per acre to our 24 bushels, 30 bushels of rye per acre to our 16 bushels, 2 tons of hay per acre to our 1¼ tons, while Italy is raising 28 bushels of corn per acre to our average of 23 bushels.

France and Austria also are producing larger crops per acre than we are.

Unless we improve our farm methods, we might just as well prepare to become a great importing nation of foodstuffs of all kinds.

Just think of the billions of pounds of beef that could be made by properly applying our "feeding stuffs" exported last year, as shown by the following table, in which corn and corn meal have been included as probably used to a considerable extent as feeding stuffs, and so with cottonseed and flaxseed, which become feeding stuffs after the extraction of oil, the total value of which was more than $64,000,000.

Exports of domestic feeding stuffs from the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

It is appalling to know that more than $200,000,000 are lost each year in this country on account of diseases of meat-producing animals, as follows:

Hog cholera	$75,000,000
Texas fever and cattle ticks	40,000,000
Tuberculosis	25,000,000
Contagious abortion	20,000,000

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Do you know the reason why the farmers are producing so many bushels of wheat per acre and of corn per acre more, and so few cattle?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I do not. Probably the gentleman can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I should think that the want of farm labor contributes largely to that condition.

Mr. BRITTEN. That may be true. I am not a farmer.

Mr. SMITH of Minnoesta. If I do not interrupt you too much——

Mr. BRITTEN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I would say that in the State of Minnesota we have farms of 200 acres that are run by one or two men, which, if they were farmed as they should be, would require at certain seasons of the year from five to eight men.

Mr. BRITTEN. Do I understand that that kind of labor is not obtainable?

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. You can not obtain it. It is not to be had when you need it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Still this Congress has passed legislation to keep strong, healthy, honest, moral men out of the country, in its recent immigration bill, because they can not read and write.

Mr. MANAHAN. That seems to be the point.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is exactly the point.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman suggest method by which a man on a 150-acre farm may profitably raise these calves?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes. The Department of Agriculture has furnished statistics showing the cost of raising a calf to the age of 2 years to be less than $40. Now, if you can get $60 for that animal you are making 50 per cent profit, and that is pretty good.

Mr. BARTON. If we could get that method in operation in the United States, it would result in the keeping of many of these calves, the killing of which you are now complaining against, because the great trouble with us fellows who are actual farmers and have land appraised at $125 or $150 and from that to $250 an acre, is to raise cattle with profit on land of that kind. We generally have to send them to the hills or where land is cheap, and that I believe is the reason why we broke up the large herds that used to roam over this cheap land.

Mr. BRITTEN. There are millions of acres of land in this country that can be bought for less than $75 an acre, which are capable of turning out the same crops that are grown in Italy, Germany, France, and Austria. It is simply a matter of improving our own conditions, and the gentleman's State—Nebraska—is a good place to begin, as your average crops of corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye, and hay for the year 1913 are smaller than almost any other State in the Union and less than one-half what they should be in comparison with the average crops of Germany.

Mr. MURDOCK. Has the gentleman finished his remarks?

Mr. BRITTEN. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. I heard the gentleman make a statement about the enormous decrease in food animals in the United States. The statement has been made before, and I have asked on several occasions what the gentlemen who made the statement believed it was due to. What does the gentleman think about that?

Mr. BRITTEN. To a very large extent the shortage of meat animals is probably due to a number of contributing causes, such as the encroachment of farms upon the range territory; absence of a proper range-leasing law permitting economical management and utilization of ranges; the increase in the value of land and the increased cost of labor and stock feed, resulting in greatly increasing the cost of production; the decline in stock raising on farms in the East and South because of poor marketing facilities resulting from many local slaughtering establishments having been driven out of business by the competition of the great central slaughtering establishments of the West and Central West.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is invariably the answer returned. Is it not also due to the enormous increase in purely agricultural, cereal land, as in central Illinois? Within a year I took a drive in an automobile through the richest part of Illinois, and I was told by the man who was driving the machine that live stock had virtually disappeared from that part of Illinois because of the enormous increase in the value of the land for cereal purposes. It seems to me it is not only because of the diminution in the ranch land of this country, but also due to the fact that the farmers on the higher priced cereal lands have quit raising live stock. Does the gentleman think that is true?

Mr. BRITTEN. That applies generally; but I will say that we have very few less cattle in Illinois to-day than we had five years ago—very few less.

Mr. MURDOCK. So that the live-stock production in Illinois is as large as it was formerly?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will not say formerly, but within the last five years.

Mr. MADDEN. But mostly for dairy purposes, is it not?

Mr. BRITTEN. No, sir; cattle as well as dairy, according to the statistics I have at hand.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BRITTEN. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. HENSLEY. You say you have nearly as many cattle in Illinois to-day as you had five years ago?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. HENSLEY. But you have not as many according to population as you had five years ago?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; we have not.

Mr. HENSLEY. The population has increased.

Mr. BRITTEN. The population, of course, increases very much more rapidly than the cattle supply, and that applies to every State in the Union, with probably three exceptions.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, I have had some experience myself in raising cattle. It is only a few years since the price of cattle was very much cheaper than now. About 10 years ago the price of cattle in Minnesota was not sufficient to pay the farmers for raising them, and so they only kept their milch cows and killed off their calves, and in that way they let their stock of cattle run down. Now, when the prices have begun to go up in that section of the country where I live, they are beginning to take care of the young cattle—raising the steers—and I think the gentleman will find that the fact that stock was cheap a few years ago had something to do with decreasing the supply for a time.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am very glad to hear that the supply is increasing in the gentleman's neighborhood. I will say that since my bill was introduced—a little less than a year ago—some 25 or 30 organizations of butchers and packers have indorsed it. By packers I mean the small packers who have been crowded out of business by the trust, which controls the shipment from practically every shipping port in the world. These small packers and butchers will indorse a bill patterned along the line of mine. [Applause.]

In January, 1914, there was a shortage of 18,259,000 meat-producing animals in this country as compared with the census figures of 1910. This means a decrease of 9 beef cattle, 7 sheep, and 3 hogs for each 100 estimated population.

An effective beef-conservation bill is more important to all the people of this country than any other measure now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, one of the most thorough students of the question of exempting labor unions and farmers' organizations from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law it has been my pleasure to know is Mr. J. H. Patten, general counsel of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America. Mr. Patten's youth was spent in my section of Kansas; and the attention he gave to the subject then has been supplemented in later years by an exhaustive legal research into every branch of the subject since his residence in the East.

I am glad to have the opportunity to present to Congress the following communication from him:

FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1914.

Hon. VICTOR MURDOCK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

CONGRESSMAN MURDOCK: I note this morning in last Saturday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that you inserted organized labor's brief against being classified as a predatory trust, and hasten to suggest that the organized farmers are equally emphatic in opposition to being so classified.

For instance, at the last national meeting of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, which was held in your State last September at Salina, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas according to the debates and statements made by Senators and Congressmen in charge of the bill on the floor of Congress in 1888 to 1890 it was never intended that the Sherman Antitrust Act should apply to aggregations of individuals, but only to aggregations of capital engineered by a few big speculators seeking unreasonable prices and profits; and

"Whereas during the first 17 years of the act the only convictions under the criminal section were farmers, promptly pardoned as a plain miscarriage of justice, the courts misinterpreting and misconstruing the act even to the extent of judicially legislating the word 'unreasonable' into the law, wrongfully holding that trade meant traders, and that any interference with trade when done by farmers or by any persons, except, apparently, the big trust magnates, was criminal restraint of trade: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America commend the action of Congress in limiting the $300,000 appropriation to the aggressive enforcement of the act and the real objects of the legislation, namely, the big trusts, and urge the importance of legislation that will correct the judicial legislation of the courts which have wrongfully decided that it means things Congress never intended and the people never expected and the construction placed upon the said law by the former and present President of the United States."

The organized farmers feel that there is quite as much reason for exempting them from such classification as there is for exempting them from involuntary bankruptcy in the Federal bankruptcy law. Their occupation is essentially individualistic. The utter impossibility of any such monopoly for extorting unreasonable prices and excessive profits as exists in oil, iron, sugar, and other industries, where enormous capital has to be assembled and can be absolutely controlled by a few, is patent. As far as the farmers are concerned, remedies are amply adequate at common law. Common-law remedies fail only when it comes to dealing with large aggregations of capital engaged chiefly in distribution and controlled by a few acting in secret concert or under "gentlemen's agreements." The exclusive object of these capitalistic combinations is invariably predatory profit and not the mutual help, education, cooperative and fraternal production, designed to increase principally the all-around individual and collective efficiency of its many members that characterize farmers' cooperative and educational unions and organizations.

Very truly, yours,

J. H. PATTEN.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. PADGETT. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why does not the gentleman want me to do that?

Mr. PADGETT. Simply because it will mean delay. The gentleman knows that in general debate we can not keep a quorum here. It is the common custom, and you can not maintain a quorum. It simply results in killing time.

Mr. MURDOCK. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BROWNING. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, as we are now engaged in a bloody "war of peace" with Mexico, and as American blood has already stained Mexican soil, I want to take this occasion to appeal to the President of the United States, in the name of humanity, in the name of the American people, and in the name of those American citizens who have been driven out of Mexico, in the name of those who have suffered unspeakable indignities, in the name of those who have been murdered, that he give some reason to the people of this country why he does not stop the sale of arms and ammunition to the bandits, highwaymen, and murderers in northern Mexico. If any reason can be given, I hope the President will give it now before the sentiment of the American people turns against the administration. The people are asking why this is not done, and they have a right to have that question answered.

We have information that millions of rounds of ammunition and a large quantity of arms have crossed the border within the last 24 hours.

We were told this morning in plain words by the dispatch from Carranza that these arms and this ammunition will probably be used to kill American soldiers. I am informed that the question was asked the Secretary of State as to whether or not they proposed to stop the sale of ammunition and arms to these assassins, Villa and Carranza, and his reply to the assembled newspaper reporters was that he considered such a question an insult, and refused to answer it. In the name of God, is there to be no end to the blundering stupidity of the State Department in relation to Mexico?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ANSBERRY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15906. An act providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. DU PONT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an observation that will not take one minute.

Mr. HENSLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia two minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all of the speech of the gentleman from Washington, but I wish to observe what has been observed on a prior historic occasion, that you can not run a war by a debating society. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Can you run a war by selling arms and ammunition to those whom you are fighting?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, before I begin I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and also that gentlemen will kindly defer questions until after my first statement is made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama to extend his remarks? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, we have come again to the naval appropriation bill. The bill this year provides for two battleships and sundry auxiliaries. That provision of the bill has been the subject of attack. I desire to address myself particularly to that question.

First allow me to point out that those who are attacking the proposition have never made any counter proposition. They have never laid down any program; they have never undertaken to establish any true naval policy. They are simply destructive and not constructive in any sense of the word. Our naval policy has a well-defined foundation. The two-battleship program itself does not come up to the requirements of a rational naval policy. This policy has no purpose of aggression, but solely one of defense. America never has been an aggressive Nation. She is not now and never will be. But America lives amongst the great and powerful military nations of the earth. We can not look to international organization for our defense. There is no international court, only the embryo of The Hague tribunal; no international parliament, only the embryo of The Hague conferences. There is no international executive, not even in embryo. Treaties lack the main basis of contract, the power of enforcement, and arbitration down to date between the great nations specifies that the subject matter of arbitration shall exclude questions of vital interest and questions of honor—the very questions for which nations fight. Having no outside recourse, nations must provide their own means for defense. At this stage of the world's political and social evolution America must provide for her own national defense and not look to any collective means of defense.

There are two forms of power—military power proper and naval power. Military power involves large numbers of men organized into armies. Naval power consists chiefly in property made up of ships. A dreadnaught to-day with a crew of 1,000 men is estimated to be more than the equivalent of an army corps of 60,000 men. Defense by naval power, therefore, does not involve military activities of the people, and what few people there are involved are far away from the mass of the people themselves. Thus, there is no tendency to militarism. On the contrary, when people can secure their defense by naval power, then industrial activities are uppermost, and their civilization follows the lines of industrialism instead of militarism. It is this great fact in history that has caused all the republics of the world to be built upon naval power. This will account for the fact that it is in such countries where defense comes through naval power that free institutions have developed most, as in the case of England. The evolution of the world has been away from militarism and toward an industrial civilization, so the history of the world has persistently hung upon the course of sea power, and the great crises, the great decisive battles, have really been naval and not military.

The perpetuation of Grecian civilization as against Persian was not settled at the Battle of Thermopylae on the land, but at the Battle of Salamis on the water. Likewise, the advent of the Augustan era of Roman history was not settled at the Battle of Philippi, but at the Battle of Actium. Indeed, the survival of Rome as against Carthage was settled when the Roman galleys gained control of the Mediterranean. The English civilization of Elizabeth overcame the Spanish civilization of Philip II because of the destruction of the Spanish Armada. England came through from the Napoleonic wars supreme as against Napoleon, because Napoleon could not cross the English Channel. England at Waterloo fought for victory; England at Trafalgar fought for existence. We have Anglo-Saxons now associated with the most advanced civilization in the world, the most advanced institutions of human liberty, because the Anglo-Saxon has held naval supremacy for a thousand years and has not been subject to militarism, to military conscription. The future of the world, like the past, is going to be settled by the control of the sea. Industrial production nations that are able to bear the burdens of building the ships to maintain naval power are the ones that are going to survive as against the nations that maintain great armies.

Industrial nations like America, holding control of the sea, are going to shape the policies of the world according to the principle of equality of opportunity, fair chance and no favor, as against military nations that always adopt the policy of exploiting the weaker peoples, and under the policy of equality of opportunity the military nations will go to the wall.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me now. I will be glad to yield to him later. I wish to proceed quickly to the question of ships. Let us pass on. The question now at the present stage of the world is, Can America utilize naval power instead of military power for her defense? Fortunately, we can depend almost entirely upon naval power. There is no great military nation of the earth that can make a land attack upon us without first getting control of the sea. So if America, with her boundless wealth, would simply undertake to insure that no great standing army shall ever have control of the sea, we can live in absolute peace and security. Our foundation policy of equality of opportunity will become the world's commercial policy and insure the survival of the productive, industrial, peaceful nations and the overthrow of militarism. Great economic forces of commerce and industry will mold the destiny of nations. Great moral forces will rule the world. The altruistic forces that are growing up with the increased intercommunication of nations will have a chance to operate with the forces of religion and education to evolve an international government and bring about at last peace upon earth and the brotherhood of man.

Therefore the basis of the American true naval policy is the principle that no nation with a great standing army, that it keeps always ready, shall have control of the sea between that nation's shores and ours.

Apply this principle to Europe. We need have no concern about the British, as the British have no great standing army. Furthermore, we have a hostage in the form of Canada; we can leave Great Britain out of our consideration. The first great military nation of Europe is Germany. Therefore our policy on the Atlantic should be to keep a fleet the equal of the German Navy, that the German Army should never be able to pass over the sea to South America or Central America or to Panama or to our coasts. If Germany had control of the sea, her great standing army all ready, with merchant vessels at hand for transports, could cross quickly and inflict serious injury on our coasts, could temporarily occupy and levy upon all of our coastwise cities, and meet with no serious resistance. They could then permanently seize the Panama Canal and any territory they pleased in Central America or South America and without control of the sea we would be powerless to strike back, no matter how great our resources.

Apply the same principle to Asia. Our Pacific slope is open to attack; Panama, Alaska, Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippine Islands are open to attack to an Asiatic army in control of the sea. With regard to the Philippine Islands I may remark that whether we stay in them or not we must protect them. I believe, for my part, that we are going to give the people of the Philippine Islands self-government as fast as they are capable of exercising it, and a little faster, but always we shall have to defend them. They are farther from us than they are from Japan, and oversea from both. Japan has a great standing army; we have not. We are entitled therefore to have such a fleet in the Pacific as not to permit that army to have control of the sea. Therefore our naval policy must insure a fleet in the Pacific at least equal to the Japanese Navy. America's true naval policy therefore, rational, simple, inevitable, with no idea of aggression upon anyone, is to have always in the Atlantic a fleet equal to the German Navy and to have always in the Pacific a fleet equal to the Japanese Navy.

The truth is, since fleets can not invade and we have no Standing Army, since even in control of the sea we could not seriously strike any nation, no nation has anything to fear from America being in control of the sea or intervening waters. Give America control of the Atlantic and control of the Pacific, and no nation could justly complain. But that is not so if they have control of the sea. They can strike a serious blow at us, for they have great standing armies. We need not think our coast defenses would give us protection, for when you have no mobile army to prevent an enemy in control of the sea from landing below and taking the forts from the rear, the forts fall. That is our situation. We would really be entitled to have a substantial superiority over the German Navy in the Atlantic and a similar superiority over the Japanese Navy in the Pacific.

Furthermore, we have 5,300 miles of exposed coast line on the Atlantic proper, 4,700 miles on the Gulf, or 10,000 miles of vital coast line on the Atlantic, and over 3,100 miles on the Pacific. Our cities are built on the seacoast and on the bays and harbors and navigable rivers leading up from the seacoast. We have 30,000,000 people in our cities, and $37,000,000,000 of property within gunshot of the sea. More of America's values are exposed to naval attack than there are values in all the rest of the world combined. Therefore the proposition that we are entitled to have a fleet on the Atlantic in equilibrium with the German Navy, and on the Pacific in equilibrium with the Japanese Navy, is modest in the extreme. Indeed, it would be reasonable to insist on a substantial margin of superiority in both oceans. But we can assume that we shall not have to contend in both oceans at the same time.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, at the expense of being refused to be allowed to interrupt, the gentleman has now reached the point upon which I would like to ask a question for my own information——

Mr. HOBSON. Could the gentleman defer it, and then I will take it up.

Mr. SHARP. It will be specially apropos just now.

Mr. HOBSON. We can bring it back to be apropos, and I should dislike to make an exception in favor of one gentleman over another. I would like to get in my little statement first. An equilibrium with the German Navy on the Atlantic and an equilibrium with the Japanese Navy on the Pacific is sufficient on the assumption that we will control the Panama Canal and will be able to concentrate our two fleets so that our fleet in the Pacific would constitute our margin of superiority in the Atlantic, and vice versa. This must be regarded as the very minimum consistent with safety, for with anything less the enemy, gaining control of the sea, could seize the canal before we could make the transfer.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, the minimum naval policy for us is to maintain a Navy equal to the combined navies of Germany and Japan. That is the reason why naval experts and others who have studied the question of national defense from a scientific point of view always discuss our Navy in connection with the Japanese Navy and the German Navy.

Let us now compare the strengths of these navies. First, let it be borne in mind that we have not set the pace. The year when America failed to provide for any battleship Germany authorized four. Even when we lagged the others went on just the same. We passed almost unanimously in this House the resolution of my friend, Mr. HENSLEY, suggesting that all nations should take a naval holiday. Our suggestion has not been heeded; the building still goes on just the same. The duty of self-preservation laid down in the preamble of the Constitution to provide for a common defense, confirmed in Article I,, section 8, paragraph 13, of the Constitution, empowering Congress to provide and maintain a navy, carried in the Democratic platform, the Republican platform, the Progressive Party's platform; this duty of self-preservation, in accord with the first law of nature for every living thing in this world, this first imperative duty that Congress owes to the country, demands that we follow the building program of Germany and the building program of Japan, and each year make out our program equal to the two combined. Let us now compare the naval programs of Germany, Japan, and America.

The table on page 41 of the report accompanying the appropriation bill supplies the best basis of comparison, containing the modern vessels of over 17,000 tons displacement built, building, or proposed by the various powers. This table contains contemporary ships of similar types and approximate tonnage. No art of manufacture advances more steadily and unceasingly than the art of naval architecture and shipbuilding. A ship of to-day compared with a ship of 20 years ago is just about analogous to a horse car compared with the electric subway.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOBSON. Please excuse me for a little while, and then I will answer all gentlemen, because if I can go on with a consecutive statement I think I may be able to answer the gentleman without his asking it. Now, take railroading. Many of you remember the locomotives of 20 years ago. Well, those locomotives compare with the present-day locomotives about as ships of 20 years ago compare with those of to-day. Indeed, progress is more incessant in the development of the arts relating to war than they are in the arts of peace. Therefore in comparing the present conditions of naval policy there is no use in going back beyond the dreadnaught period. This period came in about 1904–1906, following the Russo-Japanese War. In the comparison ships must not only be contemporaneous, but they must also be of approximate tonnage. That is because of this fundamental principle.

The dead weight of a ship—that is, the hull, the deck, and so on—is like a surface and varies as the square of a linear dimension, whereas the useful weights, like the armor and ordnance, and the like, vary with the displacement as the cube of a linear dimension. Thus, a ship of large dimensions is very much more powerful in useful weights than the equivalent tonnage in smaller ships. To make this concrete: One ship of 30,000 tons is just about equivalent to five ships of 10,000 tons, and the cost per ton is just about the same. You can see the advantages of the large unit, and you can see that beyond a certain reasonable limit of tonnage you can not put widely differing sizes together. The table is confined to the dreadnaught period. In any manufacturing art there will come a time when a new method or process will revolutionize the art. Then from there on those who compete will equip themselves with the new equipment until some other revolutionary period sets in.

Now, the dreadnaught period, as I say, began just following the Japanese war, and the tonnage that differentiates that period is about 17,000. So I have had this table drawn to include that. It is drawn up by the Bureau of Naval Intelligence, and if you will examine the table you will find that Great Britain has 42 vessels of this period, making a tonnage of 962,000 tons. Germany has 28 vessels of this period, making a tonnage of 678,000. The names are given and the tonnage of each and the date. Next comes France. She has 18 of this period, with a tonnage of 398,000. Then comes the United States, with 12 vessels and a tonnage of 307,000.

Now, some debate came up as to whether the South Carolina and Michigan ought to be included in this list. They are of 16,000 tons. In armament, in offensive power, they are the strongest ships of their tonnage ever built. Unfortunately, they are only 18-knot ships, and so they could not utilize their great offensive power alongside of these faster ships.

The Michigan and the South Carolina represent more the transition period. Before we launched out squarely on the dreadnaught period we built those two ships. Suppose we put them in for good measure. That would give America 14 ships with a tonnage of 339,000. Next comes Japan with 12 ships and 310,000 tons, ranging up close to America. This table, the most scientific that can be devised, shows that America, which a few years ago was second, now stands fourth and is dropping toward even a lower place. The table shows that during this dreadnaught period Germany has been averaging a little over three of these ships per year—about three and a half—and Japan has been averaging between one and two—about one and one-third, so that the minimum we should have averaged is over four per year and nearer five. We have actually averaged only one and a half. That is the reason why we have gotten down to this really unfortunate position of being fourth amongst the naval powers of the world, when we were second. This plan and this method are simplicity itself. Any Member can inspect the table and see how many we are now short and what number we ought to average. The wise and conservative plan would be to make up one ship a year above the number required by the averages. These averages call for four. Our wise policy would be five.

Now, some have asked me because of the complexities and confusions brought into this discussion to make a technical comparison of old ships with the ships of to-day, because all of the conclusions of those who signed the minority report are based on the assumption that these old ships can be placed right along with the new. To begin with, they start off with the Oregon class. Now, I would like to say for the Oregon class that at their date they were the finest ships of their types in the world. I said before that we can compare contemporary ships of all nations—that is, on the assumption that foreign designers are on a par with our designers. That is the fair assumption to make. I actually believe, however, that our designers are the best in the world. I have not any hesitation in saying that the Oregon, compared with her contemporaries, was the best-designed ship in the world. I have no hesitation in saying that the South Carolina and Michigan are the best-designed ships of 16,000 tons in the world. I am inclined to think that the Spanish Cristobal Colon, of Italian design, was the best-designed vessel of her class. The Italians and Americans have probably gotten the best results on a limited displacement. The French are perhaps more scientific, but have not been as practical. So, properly speaking, you can count on the American designs being full up, if not ahead, of contemporaneous designs. The old Oregon was a grand old ship of her day, and even though a coastwise battleship, requiring frequent goings into port, her tour around the Horn was the most successful big feat ever performed. My imagination was so much fired with that trip that I wrote a juvenile on the subject, a book for boys, called "In Line of Duty," and Capt. Clark was the hero of that juvenile.

So I do not want anyone to imagine that I do not appreciate the prowess of the old Oregon. She was termed a "coast-line battleship," and you know why that was. They had only some ten thousand and odd tons of displacement, and when you have a limitation like that you have got to cut down on some elements. You can not have great armor, great ordnance, great machinery weights all together on a small ship. Among other things they had to cut down the freeboard of the Oregon. She was a transition between the monitor class and the seagoing battleship.

I am sorry that this profile tracing here does not show up more clearly. In red we see the Oregon. You will notice that her stem and stern come up just about at the end of the turrets of the later ship, which is the Nevada, with which we are comparing her. You can not see it clearly at a distance, but her spar deck comes right along here about where the berth deck comes on the other ship. The smaller dimensions of the Oregon appear a little more clearly in the cross-section drawing here. That red is the Oregon put upon a cross section of the latest ship, the Pennsylvania. Returning to the profile, there is the water line fore and aft, showing the low freeboard [indicating]. That means that they had to sacrifice buoyancy and stability. They also had to sacrifice elevation of the guns. Now, you can not carry much coal on the Oregon or any large amount of supplies to carry her far from the coast without putting her deep in the water and submerging her heavy armor belt. As a matter of fact, the Oregon at times, like the Indiana and Massachusetts, her sisters, did have the top of her armor below the water line, so the armor was not giving any protection above the water line.

There were interesting parallels to the Oregon in the Russian Navy, the Borodino class. In the war with Japan four of them took part in the Battle of Tschushima. The Russians did not appreciate this question of stability and buoyancy. They had those ships loaded down like we had the Oregon and her sister ships. So the heavy armor, supposed to protect the water line, had its top below the water line. Before the Battle of Tschushima was over three out of these four ships either capsized or sank. Thus in trying to make a seagoing battleship out of the Oregon it is necessary to undermine its stability and buoyancy and to have such a low elevation of her guns as to make them unserviceable in a seaway. Even when at normal draft her guns are only 16 feet above water compared to 32 feet of the Pennsylvania.

Now, as to the question of size. The Oregon is of some ten thousand and odd tons, the Pennsylvania over 31,000 tons.

I would not hesitate to say that if the Oregon were a contemporary of the Pennsylvania, and if the Oregon were of the same type and class as the Pennsylvania, so that they could be intelligently compared, the Pennsylvania would be the equivalent of at least five or six Oregons.

We come to the question of the relative fighting powers of the ships. First, the ship must float, must be able to receive punishment and still float. Take the Oregon. You notice how short that belt line of the Oregon's armor is. The red line in the drawing shows the belt line. It is only 150 feet long, covering scarcely half the length of the ship, leaving the ends unprotected; while the blue, the Nevada, is 500 feet long, covering five-sixths of the whole length. Under the present conditions of ordnance, where they use the semiarmor-piercing shells, with cordite and melanite and explosive D, it means that the whole unarmored ends would be riddled and would be filled with water. With only the four forward compartments filled, the Oregon could not live, even if she went into battle in normal condition, with her armor where it ought to be. If she did not venture far, but were attacked on the coast by one of these big ships, she would live only a little while. She would be bound to sink. If you open up the four forward compartments, the water would come to the top of the forward turrets and she would sink. The same thing would happen aft. On the other hand, take the Nevada here or the Pennsylvania. Notice how far that armor comes forward and how high the armor is. Here is a comparison: The Oregon's thick armor is 7½ feet high and the Pennsylvania's 17 feet. Suppose you were to flood the whole of the unarmored portion of the Nevada or the Pennsylvania. She would go down by the head, but that would not hurt her very much. She would change in draft and trim, but the mean change of draft would be only about 1½ feet. She could fight every gun she had. The same thing applies aft. She would continue to fight. It would sink her armor here just a little bit lower in the water; that is all.

But, now, suppose the injury came under water, amidships, And I may remark here again that the Oregon was never built to withstand torpedo attacks. If you will consult these detailed drawings here you will appreciate that. At the date the Oregon was built the torpedo was small, had a range of only a few hundred yards at best, with almost no accuracy of fire. Now the torpedo is an accurate weapon at 10,000 yards' range, carrying 250 pounds of high explosive. They are building the underwater structure of ships now to withstand the blow of these torpedoes. It would probably take three of the greatest torpedoes to completely put out of action a modern ship. But if one of them should hit the Oregon she would go down like a shot. There would not be a chance for the people in her to get out. They would be carried down like rats. If you attacked her with a small torpedo, with a small charge, and struck abreast the boiler, you would bilge these compartments in the Oregon, and in battle she would be sure to sink. If it struck abreast the engine room here [indicating on drawing], she would keel over at once to 8° and sink her armor belt under water. Similar damage on the Pennsylvania or Nevada would not endanger the ship at all. And I may remark, incidentally, that the Oregon's turrets are the old-time cylindrical turrets, not balanced, and when you turn all the Oregon's guns on one side she keels over, as seen in the drawing, till the top of her armor belt is submerged.

This drawing shows the Oregon with all her guns turned on one side, and it has put her armor belt under water. With the modern type of balanced turret, you can swing them anywhere without affecting the ship. The Oregon could not resist the semiarmor-piercing shell; she could not resist the torpedoes of the big ship. Sending her to fight a dreadnaught would be like sending a child to fight a man.

Let us now compare the gunfire of the two ships. I had it worked out for the Pennsylvania and the Oregon. The Oregon's guns could not be effective beyond 6,000 yards. At that range her guns could only penetrate 9.7 inches of armor. The Pennsylvania's guns are effective away beyond 10,000 yards. At that range they would penetrate 15.9 inches of armor. The Pennsylvania's torpedoes are effective at more than 10,000 yards. So the Pennsylvania could lie off 10,000 yards and destroy the Oregon without running risk of any harm. Remember, the Pennsylvania has 21 knots speed and the Oregon 16 knots. The Pennsylvania could therefore choose the range.

Now, great stress was put upon the power of the volley of the Oregon. I have it worked out here, if any of you would like to know just what it is. I will not take time to go into details. But, take a single broadside from the Oregon and a single broadside from the Pennsylvania. The total energy of one 13-inch gun of the Oregon would be 31,300 foot-tons, and the total broadside of both 13-inch and 8-inch guns 150,000 foot-tons for the Oregon. Now, take the Pennsylvania. The total energy of one of her big guns is 65,700 foot-tons. The total energy of the broadside is 788,000 foot-tons.

Now, you notice this difference at once. The Oregon's guns, those old guns, do well to fire one round in 3½ minutes. The Pennsylvania's guns fire two to three a minute, or more than six times as rapidly. Compare the energy delivered from minute to minute, and every minute the Oregon would develop 52,375 foot-tons while every minute the Pennsylvania would develop 1,576,488 foot-tons, or thirty times as much.

Now, mark you, the Pennsylvania's power can destroy the Oregon before the Oregon's power can be available against the Pennsylvania at all; but even if it were in effective range, the Pennsylvania would smother the Oregon almost instantly.

It does not seem to me that it is necessary to go further into this. If any gentlemen are undecided about it, we will compare them further; but I assume that it is only necessary to recall that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] concluded his long speech of two hours with the statement that the old coast line battleship Oregon of 20 years ago, and only 10,000 tons displacement, could destroy any six dreadnoughts of the Germany Navy before they could practically harm her, to show the ludicrous premises upon which he based his conclusion.

Mr. POU. Just in line with that, I understand the point that is being made is that the information given us by the gentleman from Mississippi is not accurate. I should like to hear the gentleman on that for a minute.

Mr. HOBSON. I shall be very glad to state it. This is the official information which I am giving. I notice that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON], and also the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY], cited these elements of United States naval guns, and it is a pity they did not get them correctly, because even on the assumptions they were making you will find repeated errors of material importance, for instance, when they were comparing the 12-inch 50-caliber with the 12-inch 35-caliber gun they stated that at 9,000 yards the 50-caliber gun had a penetration of only 11½ inches, a difference as compared to the 35-caliber gun, 7.2 inches, of only 3.8 inches. As a matter of fact, the newer gun has a penetration of 12.2 inches, and at that range making the difference 5 inches.

In comparing the Oregon's 13-inch guns of 35 calibers with the 12-inch 50-caliber guns you will find that they state, for instance, that the higher-powered 12-inch gun at 9,000 yards has a penetration of 11 inches. The table shows that it would penetrate 16.4 inches. Likewise with the 8-inch guns, and so on.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand you to be comparing the Oregon with the various advanced types of ships now being constructed by the United States?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course we all realize, and I do not understand that the claim has ever been made that the Oregon is equal to these new ships; but are there not in the navies of the other nations of the world, Germany, for instance, vessels which are rated as a part of the navy, that are in a general way of the same strength, age, type, and so forth, as the Oregon?

Mr. HOBSON. I think the Germans are holding on to their old ships longer than any other nation, simply because the new ships are not completed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. But these old ships are no stronger or more powerful than the Oregon?

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman is absolutely correct about that. The gentleman will find, however, that nations will carry old ships on their lists, but they would not put them on their battle line. They would not send them out to fight against dreadnaughts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. The gentleman from New Jersey said he would give me 15 minutes.

Mr. BROWNING. I give the gentleman 15 minutes.

Mr. HOBSON. I will say to the gentleman that in the British navy ships like the Empress of India and ships of the Royal Sovereign class, that were cotemporaries of the Oregon, have been scrapped. They have just destroyed the Empress of India as a target at 16,000 yards range. The Empress of India was 15,000 tons, and came after the Oregon.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does the gentleman maintain that all the ships which he has counted for Germany are equal to the Pennsylvania in power?

Mr. HOBSON. No; nor do I maintain that all counted for the United States equal the Pennsylvania. I explained that difference, but I showed how they are analogous.

Now, gentlemen, it was really pitiful the way the no-battleship Members tried to prove something about the Oregon, to claim that the Navy Department was not trying to make a good ship out of the Oregon. Gentlemen, the Navy Department has done all they could to make as good a ship as they can make out of the Oregon, but they can not change the structure of the ship. They have put in Babcock-Wilcox boilers. They have tried to do the best they can; but you can not put new cloth into an old suit and get good results. Gentlemen said they did not give the guns of the Oregon a fair chance, that they only put in half a charge. Why, gentlemen, if they did put in a full charge it would blow the gun into a thousand pieces. The Oregon's guns were made to use what they call charcoal powder—brown, prismatic powder. If they put in a full charge of the new powder, you would not have any guns or any Oregon.

Likewise they say, "Why do they not put up-to-date guns into the Oregon?" Because the diameter of the turret will not permit it. You simply can not get them into the turret.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not a fact that the hull structure of the Oregon would not permit up-to-date guns being put on the ship?

Mr. HOBSON. If you put in new turrets you might, but you would have to change the whole construction of the magazines and everything below. You would have to try to make a new ship, which would be ridiculous.

This brings me to a point that I think ought to be taken up. I believe the gentlemen who made the minority report did so in the best of good faith. I believe that they had solely in mind the public interest. I know that. The gentlemen are earnest, good men, and it took a good deal of moral courage for them to write that report. They gave our Democratic administration of the Navy no credit for its constructive reforms, introducing vocational education in the Navy, and requiring sobriety throughout; they gave it no credit for its estimates being kept down, for the bills carrying for this year with two battleships than it did last year with only one. They would have it appear that the battleship features were full of extravagance. As a matter of fact, it is the maintenance, the high pay of our men, the good food and clothing, that costs so much more than in foreign navies. The costs for new construction are low. In fact, the costs of new construction make a good basis of comparison of strength of navies in up-to-date vessels. From 1904–5 for new construction the figures have been as follows:

TOTALS.

Great Britain, $724,205,105; Germany, $456,982,692; United States, $346,526,462; France, $260,125,988; Japan, $107,412,077.

Since 1907–8 they have been the following for the United States, as compared with Germany and Japan: Germany, $359,293,701; Japan, $76,519,890. The two combined make $435,813,591, which should have been the amount for us on the two-power basis. Indeed, our amount actually was only $184,798,519, less than half of what it should have been. This about tallies with the comparison by ship and tonnage. But the point I want to bring out now is that it is regretable that the gentlemen making the minority report should undertake to make insinuations and charges of bad faith and even dishonesty on the part of the Navy Department and the Navy administration. One of the charges is that the Navy Department violated the wishes of Congress when they built the Pennsylvania and No. 39 larger than previous ships. Now, if you will take pains to look up the antecedents you will find there has been nothing of the kind. The Oregon, for instance, was appropriated for under an act that provided—

That for the further purpose of increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed by contract three seagoing coast-line battleships designed to carry the heaviest armor and the most powerful ordnance upon a displacement of about 8,500 tons.

The bill provided so much money, exclusive of armor and armament. On the money limitation the Oregon turned up with a displacement of 10,288 tons within the appropriation that was put down for "about" 8,500 tons. It was not criticized.

The next appropriation was for the ships following the Oregon class, and they followed the same general practice. For instance, you take the Iowa. They appropriated for "about" 9,000 tons, and she came out with 11,346 tons. Take the Kearsarge and Kentucky. The bill was for "about" 10,000 tons, and they came out 11,520 tons.

Mr. HULINGS. And how about the appropriations?

Mr. HOBSON. They were built within the appropriation. The idea that they could go on and spend the Government money not appropriated is against the law, and is ridiculous on the face of it.

Mr. MADDEN. And if they could get 2,000 tons more for the same money, they were doing the Government a service.

Mr. HOBSON. They were doing the Government a service.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman state what is the tendency in England with reference to the size of battleships?

Mr. HOBSON. I think they are running up. I can tell the gentleman, for I have it here.

Mr. HENSLEY. I do not think the gentleman from Alabama can have investigated that question, if he says that.

Mr. HOBSON. They are foolish if they have not run up.

Mr. HENSLEY. Are they not devoting more time to building submarines?

Mr. HOBSON. I have it here, and I can answer the gentleman. In 1910 the biggest British ship was 23,000 tons. They got up an armored cruiser for 27,000 tons. In 1911 the largest ship was 25,000 tons, and then, in 1912, 27,500 tons. An armored cruiser, 28,500 tons. Queen Elizabeth and Queen Mary went up still higher.

Mr. HENSLEY. How much higher?

Mr. HOBSON. The Tiger, 28,500 tons.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does the gentleman know what they are authorizing this year?

Mr. HOBSON. That has not been reported. I am inclined to think that it will be fully 30,000 tons.

Mr. HENSLEY. Twenty-four thousand five hundred tons.

Mr. HOBSON. The British have been building Japanese vessels, and they run those out a little faster than they do their own. For the Japanese they have run up to 30,000 tons. We keep a little ahead of them in tonnage, which is in line with the true principle. The point I am making is that we did not exceed the money appropriation. What I have cited from the act applies to every ship until we come to the following, until we come to the ships of the Idaho class, and then it said "not more than 16,000 tons," and those vessels came out with 16,000 tons. This wording continued on down to the South Carolina and the Michigan, and this was the last act providing "not more than" 16,000 tons, and these vessels are 16,000 tons. After these vessels were finished we went back to the old wording—you see the dreadnaught class was evolving—we went back to the old wording to let the naval architects evolve. So in the appropriation for the Delaware we have the following wording:

> One first-class battleship carrying as heavy armor and as powerful armament as any known vessel of its class, to have the highest practical speed and greatest possible radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $6,000,000.

We followed with exactly the same wording, carrying $6,000,000 appropriation clear on down until we reached the Nevada and Oklahoma; and by that time we had reached a displacement of 27,500 tons. The Delaware started out with a displacement of 20,000 tons, and yet, on the same appropriation and under the same wording, we have got up to 27,500 tons. Now, then, we come to the appropriation for the Pennsylvania, and No. 39, which is analogous, and from which they say the Navy Department has been trying to evade the will of Congress. What was the appropriation? The wording was exactly the same as for the dreadnaughts already authorized. What did we do about the sum appropriated? We went up from $6,000,000 to $7,425,000. That was an authorization and instruction to our naval architects to go above the 27,500 tons displacement obtained for $6,000,000. They have carried out the will of Congress, and they have been efficient. I believe they have got the best return on the money. The department has built these vessels in accordance with the will of Congress and in keeping with the efficiency of the Government service. [Applause.]

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. I will.

Mr. SHARP. I wish to interrupt the gentleman for only a moment. A year or two ago, by the courtesy of the gentleman who has been instructing the House so well [Mr. HOBSON], I was invited down the Potomac with a party of friends, Members of Congress and others, to witness some armor-plate tests. There was present a gentleman who was the inventor of a high explosive, and I think the gentleman from Alabama will bear me out in the accuracy of my statement that there occurred a very acrimonious debate between this inventor, who was very enthusiastic as to the superiority of his explosive, and one of our typical naval officers, who would never acknowledge defeat either in war or peace. One night, as we were seated around the table in the cabin of the boat, this discussion went on, and we all became interested listeners. The inventor of this new explosive drew a diagram, fanciful, of course, depicting what might be our position in a battle at sea with some foreign power, and finally wound up by asking the naval officer, who was challenging some of his conclusions, what he thought we would be able to do with our boats if we were placed in such a predicament, very disadvantageous, evidently, from the drawing on the plat.

The naval officer, with considerable impatience and disgust, answered that we would not allow ourselves to get in that kind of a position, and I think with a good deal of truth. I have lots of faith and abounding confidence in the ability of our naval officers to take care of themselves always. They are a splendid lot of men—the best in the world—whose courage and integrity never ought to be questioned. But now, to change and reverse that question and put it in the mouths of the German and the English Government officials, who might ask the gentleman from Alabama what he expected would be their position and what would they be doing if we undertook to keep up this endless chain of rivalry of maintaining, as the gentleman says, our equilibrium upon the high seas. I want to know where the end would be, if there ever was any end, save in taxing to death the people who had to pay for these enormous engines of warfare?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HOBSON. I thank the gentleman from California. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman from Ohio has brought that out. There are two elements involved in that question. The first is that they are going to build according to their programs whether we build or whether we stop. That does not mean that we should change our national policy, outlined already, simply because they have a balance of power in Europe.

It does not mean that a great nation like ours should depend upon the equilibrium of Europe for our defense. That is the defense that Turkey has always relied upon, and China and Korea, and yet the European nations have come to an understanding for a long enough time among themselves for one of them to carry on a war of aggression with those countries.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman explained, in comparison with the German and American Navies, the effect as to the comparative strength of the German fast unarmored cruisers?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman has brought that out. I will answer it in a moment. The other factor involved in the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHARP] is this, that if we maintain our policy it will not tax us much. Do not let anyone imagine that this Nation is ground down. By the way, will a page please ask the gentleman from Mississippi, Judge WITHERSPOON, to return to the Hall preliminary to the next point I am going to bring up?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. I am in the midst of a statement. I merely happen to notice that the gentleman from Mississippi had retired to the cloakroom. Returning, the point is that this is not going to be a burden upon us. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will catch this thought. It was intimated in the introductory remarks that the nation that is industrial is the nation with the money, and it can, therefore, bear the burdens; and the nation that is military, that carries the great standing army, that takes its men away from useful pursuits, and has a stratification in society, interfering with the free play of economic forces, the nation that tries to remain medieval, is the nation that can not keep the pace. So that that race would end by eliminating the military and destructive countries and would mean the final supremacy of the world to the peaceful and the commercial.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, in refutation of that statement——

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I have two important points yet to bring out.

Mr. SHARP. It is only in answer to something that the gentleman brought up in reply to my question, and I think I am entitled to an explanation of it. In refutation of what has been stated here, that such expenditures can not be a burden to us, is it not a fact that there is already widespread complaint and great distress under the burden of taxation today in Germany and England on account of the tremendous war expenses over there?

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman that the chewing-gum bill in America alone for one year would pay for twice as many dreadnaughts as we propose to appropriate for this year. [Applause.] And I will say to him that the economic load laid upon this Nation by the liquor interests of America would support our Navy for a hundred years.

Mr. SHARP. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. HOBSON. And I want to say to him that Von Moltke made the statement that Germany had more to fear from beer than she had from all of the armies and navies of France.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman that I was on a trip to Panama with an officer of the Army, and he differed somewhat from the gentleman from Alabama as to what we really need. He said that what we needed was a great standing Army in this country, and that we did not need any Navy.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman, if he will permit me, in answer to that, that if you do not have a navy that will keep the enemy's army from reaching your shores, then you will some day have to have an army to drive him out; and since we have not the Navy and have not gone on with the naval program, of course you have to have your Army to take care of itself in Hawaii, the Philippines, and Panama, and everywhere else.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Is not this a fact: That the naval men want a great navy, and the Army men want a great army?

Mr. HOBSON. I will tell the gentleman what is the fact. The Army men and the Navy men want their country to have a reasonable defense policy [applause], and on this they are united. The two branches are interrelated. The stronger the Navy the weaker the Army can be with safety down to a certain point, and vice versa.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. With reference to the increase in the size of battleships and the worries some gentlemen have in regard to it, is it not true that the depths of harbors in various countries tend to limit the size of the battleships?

Mr. HOBSON. I think that will ultimately, of course, limit the size of the evolution. I have not any hesitation in saying that naval ordnance is passing through a new revolution with the development of the torpedo shell. I do not like to go any further into the matter of the stage of the development in our country, but this development is going to make it so that you would not have to puncture the armor at long ranges, and it will tend to put the battleship cruiser on a fighting par with the dreadnaught and give it advantage on account of greater speed, and it will tend to make it absolutely necessary to have some of those high speeds to make effective our fleet and the dreadnaughts.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. I will.

Mr. LEVY. Is it not a fact that foreign guns are increasing in caliber?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. To 15 inches?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. How large will ours be?

Mr. HOBSON. We are now building 14-inch. Germany, I understand, has a 15.3.

Mr. LEVY. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. HOBSON. And when we come to consider the naval appropriation bill under the five-minute rule, I am going to offer an amendment to provide for some of these fast battleships or battleship cruisers, for the simple reason that the other nations have provided them, and this new form of attack will come in the near future.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman spoke of the high explosive shell and the progress being made, and also stated that that will be something which will tend to revolutionize battleships in the future. Will it not have this effect, to change the character and the number of plates that are used on the armor in building one of these ships?

Mr. HOBSON. I think that revolution is going on all the time.

Mr. FOWLER. One other question. The gentleman, if I understand him, says that the strength of the Navy does not necessarily rest on the number of individual units, but in the strength of each unit. Do I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. HOBSON. Both.

Mr. FOWLER. I understand, also, the gentleman says that Germany is holding to the old type of battleships. Is that true?

Mr. HOBSON. No; Germany is right up in front.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that Germany is building the double and triple plate dreadnaught? Is not Germany doing that thing?

Mr. HOBSON. I assume the gentleman refers to a matter of building the hulls against torpedo attack. That is the reason why the Oregon and such ships are out of class, and doubly out of class.

Mr. FOWLER. The United States never has entered upon that plan of the construction of ships.

Mr. HOBSON. I am not going to say what the United States is doing. Remember, I have been a critic in the Naval Committee and elsewhere, and I have been chairman of the subcommittee on ordnance, and all that, and I want to say, and I repeat what I said at the outset, in all phases of naval architecture I believe you will find American designs right up to the others. [Applause.] But if you do not give the appropriations for battle cruisers, we can not have them, no matter how able are our designers.

Mr. FOWLER. And is it not true we will be compelled to increase if these high-explosive shells increase?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes; we will be compelled to do that; that is true. Now, I want, in connection with the case apparently attempetd to be made out with reference to the criminality of the naval administration, to say I find here on page 7407 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] in these words. He had been referring to a comparison of our Navy with the navies of other nations, and he puts us next after Great Britain, and so on, and said the next one near us was Germany, and then he made this statement:

> So that Germany is the last straw that the grafters can catch hold of.

I rose shortly after that and asked if the gentleman would not yield, as follows:

> Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
> Mr. WITHERSPOON. I can not yield.
> Mr. HOBSON. After the gentleman uses the word "grafters" he can not yield?
> Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I have notified the gentleman from Alabama that I decline to yield to him.

Now, this question of comparing our Navy with the navy of Germany has been a regular part of our naval discussion since the advent of the dreadnaught in the German building program that was authorized, as I remember correctly, about 1906. All the members of the General Board have been making a comparison. The Secretary of the Navy's aides and his chiefs of bureaus do the same. I have been amongst those who have been doing the same on our committee.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Pardon me now. The officers who have been spoken of so scornfully as experts do not have the privileges of the floor of this House, and, furthermore, they are not permitted by the Constitution to call any Member of Congress to account for any statement made on the floor of the House. I think it is due to those men that I say this. I know every member of the General Board; I know all the aides of the Secretary, and I know all the chiefs of bureaus; I know them personally. They are not only patriotic men, animated by patriotic motives, but they are honest men. [Applause.]

I was 18 years in the Navy. I can not remember once, and I do not believe anybody in the House can remember a time in Navy history, when any naval officer was ever found guilty of grafting. [Applause.] I believe, gentlemen, it is due to these officers, who can not answer for themselves, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] should at this point disclaim any purpose of calling any of those officers grafters, and I yield now for the gentleman from Mississippi to do so. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] sits silent.

As for other members of the Naval Committee, those who have been comparing us with Germany, they can take up the matter for themselves as they see fit, but I believe it is due to me—inasmuch as the gentleman would not yield time the other day when he was speaking, I will yield to him time now—I think it is due me for him to state now, in my time, that he did not include me in that category. I pause. The gentleman remains silent.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOBSON. Pardon me. Will the gentleman kindly excuse me? This does not deal with him.

Mr. HENSLEY. Certainly; if you do not want to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman want more time?

Mr. HOBSON. If you please.

Mr. BROWNING. How many minutes?

Mr. HOBSON. Give me five minutes.

Mr. BROWNING. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HOBSON. If I want five minutes more where will I get the time?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I also yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] yields five minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS] yields five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HOBSON. I stated, and I repeat it, it is my belief that the gentlemen signing the minority report are good men, all of them—good men, and true. I have great admiration for them all individually, and I wish to repeat it that I believe they have been animated by the purest motives, all of them. I do not believe that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON], without producing the specifications, did include or would include these naval officers or myself when he used the word "grafter."

Mr. HENSLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, right there——

Mr. HOBSON. Kindly, kindly excuse me, sir. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. HENSLEY. I thought the gentleman said he would yield a moment ago.

Mr. HOBSON. I will say this, however, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi does not see fit to make such disavowal, I take the responsibility of saying that any charge made by anyone against those naval officers, whom I know, that they are grafters, is false. I desire to state that any man who says that in connection with this bill or any other bill, or in any other relationship of mine with the Government, that by thought, word, or deed I have been a grafter, he simply lies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come for the Navy of the United States and its personnel to be given a square deal. [Applause.] They have been efficient from the start. It has been a characteristic of our Navy from the ancient days. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], who gave a history of the Navy the other day in such able and eloquent terms, did not overstate it. Take it in the Revolutionary War; not only was Saratoga possible because of the delays of the British, due to our vessels on Lake Champlain, but also because reenforcements and supplies from England were cut off on the high seas by the Navy. In the Revolutionary War our improvised Navy captured more than 800 English ships with more than 12,000 seamen. In the war with France you remember how complete were our victories. And I want to take occasion here—I am sorry the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has gone—I want to take occasion here to say that I resented it through and through when in a discussion of the Mexican resolution he stated that we would not do in Mexico what we are doing if it had been the case of a strong and powerful nation. [Applause.]

When a principle was involved at the time of the Revolution, we defied the greatest navy and military power in the world, defenseless as we were, with less than three and one-half millions of people. And in that war with France we defied the great Napoleon, and told him plainly that America had "millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute." [Applause.] And we defied the Barbary pirates. And again, "for free trade and sailors' rights" in 1812 we defied the mistress of the seas. Yes; this Monroe doctrine of ours was laid down by an American President in the face of almost combined Europe. Yes; and President Cleveland in his Venezuelan message defied the mistress of the seas; and President Roosevelt, when Germany hoisted her flag in Venezuela, did the same thing. I do not hesitate to say here to-day that America would fight to the last drop of her blood all of the nations of the world, if they so much as laid an unfriendly finger upon Mexico. [Applause.]

This Nation is a Nation of principle and of idealism. It was for principle that our forefathers left their homes in Europe and came to this unexplored country and settled amongst the savage Indians. All our wars have been typified by unparalleled devotion to principle and to the highest ideals at any cost. Take the War with Spain. Spain was a weaker nation. Yes; but we never harmed Spain unnecessarily. I have roamed over the trenches that the German soldiers dug around Paris when in 1871 they cut off the food supply and starved the city into capitulation.

The women and children were crying for bread, and with this weapon the Germans brought France to her knees; and when the Germans, with their heels upon the neck of France, concluded the war, they demanded 5,000,000,000 francs for war indemnity and the cession of Alsace and Lorraine. I am not saying anything against Germany. France would have done the same thing if she had reached Berlin.

But it was my fate, later, to see the Spaniards dig their trenches and place their artillery.

I was inside of the lines and watched the inner trenches and outer trenches, and I said, "The strategy will be very simple here at Santiago. We will do like the Germans did—we will cut off the food supply, and the starving women and children will compel surrender." They were already getting hungry on the inside, I knew very well, because I was getting hungry myself, although I was getting a regular ration. I thought, "We will starve them into capitulation and not lose a man."

You can imagine my astonishment one morning when I saw the people of Santiago pouring out, women and children and decrepit old men, 18,000 of them, more than our whole army, as Gen. HULINGS, I see here, remembers. They went out to El Caney. For what purpose? To be fed by the American troops, though this act of mercy might have necessitated the storming of trenches and cost us thousands of lives. [Applause.]

And when the Battle of Santiago was over and Spain lay fallen and impotent we assembled our fleet at Guantanamo, and each hour we expected the orders to cross the Atlantic and destroy the remaining Spanish fleet and blockade and bombard the Spanish coast, and then to have our country dictate the terms she chose. We were ready to do that work if wanted. It would have been easy and simple, not only to have taken what territory we chose but also to have exacted hundreds of millions of dollars in indemnity. Instead, what happened? We never left Guantanamo.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. I would like to have 5 minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 5 minutes more.

Mr. HOBSON. We invited Spain's envoys to meet ours in France, and learning that Spain was already impoverished we actually ended a victorious war by paying the conquered foe $20,000,000 and then voluntarily transported the Spanish soldiers back home to Spain. [Applause.]

Yes; the nations of the earth laughed in our face when we began the war, and said we went to war in the interests of Cuba. When the war was over Cuba was ours by the law of conquest. We had spent blood and treasure upon her. But did we keep Cuba and make her pay us back and give us an indemnity? No. We took little Cuba by the hand. We showed her how to stand alone. We hope she has learned to walk alone. We gave her her independence, and I believe the same spirit to-day permeates the heart of America toward Mexico. As the President has announced, in this Mexican war we do not go in with the thought of conquest. It is not with the thought of hatred or revenge. We are going to be the true friend of Mexico; we are going to be the true friend of all the weaker peoples of this hemisphere. Yes; the true friend of the Filipinos; and under the open-door policy we are going to be the true friend of China; and wherever America's influence is carried by the Stars and Stripes from the mastheads of our ships you will find America the friend of the weak, the friend of the friendless, to promote the interests of humanity and establish at last justice to all men. [Applause.]

And I want to say to you that the naval officers on the ships will carry out this will. When John Paul Jones first hoisted the rattlesnake flag at the peak of the Ranger the legend on it was, "Don't tread on me," a warning to the greatest naval power in the world, your Navy representing you. Yes; and in the fight on the Bonhomme Richard with the Serapis, you remember, when the ship was sinking, the British commander on the serapis called out, "Have you struck?" and Jones replied, "No, sir; we have only begun to fight, sir." And you will remember down here in the ill-fated Chesapeake, how Lawrence, with his last breath, gave us our motto in the Navy, "Don't give up the ship."

I tell you, gentlemen, we ought, as a people, to appreciate more this Navy of ours. I have seen the time when the appropriations for development amounted to nothing. When I entered the Navy I had to drill at old muzzle-loading guns. But the officers were there, uncomplaining. Promotion stagnated. Sometimes a lieutenant was 50 years of age and had grandchildren, and no promotion. They never said a word of complaint. But at last the sudden transition came to the steel ship and to steam and electricity, and they were there, efficient and ready.

Take the War of 1812, when the English sent ships across the water seven times as numerous as our whole Navy. Those English ships were the ships that had conquered at Trafalgar. Those ships had fought 200 duels with foreign ships, and they lost only five fights. They fought 18 duels with American ships, and they lost 15 out of the 18 in fights. [Applause.]

Then you come down to the time of Dewey and Sampson and Schley and what do you find? Never before in the history of the world had any fleet totally destroyed another fleet, and never before in the history of the world had a fleet gained a fleet victory without suffering serious loss itself. There at Manila Bay and again at Santiago, twice in the same short war, our Navy simultaneously broke two world's records, totally destroyed the enemy, and suffered no loss itself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. HOBSON. I would like to have one more minute.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman five minutes if he needs it. [Applause.]

Mr. HOBSON. I do not need it. I do not desire to detain the House. But I wish to call your attention to the way other nations recognize their navies. You will see the recognition they give them in promotion and in other ways. Our naval officers do not ask much. They only ask a chance to serve, and not to have sinister motives imputed to them by their own Government. In England they are proud of their navy's record. They raise great monuments to their naval heroes, and well they may be proud of them; but the proud British flag once bowed its head before the Dutch, and the Dutch, in turn, before the British. The French, Spanish, German, Italian, and all the navies of the world with any length of history have at one time or another hauled down their flags in defeat from masthead and peak. Here is our Navy neglected, the very motives of its devoted officers impugned. Here is our Navy forgotten, when ours is the only Navy in all the world that has never yet known defeat. Let us begin to do the Navy justice. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNING. Has the gentleman from North Carolina any time to yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] to use some of his time.

Mr. BROWNING. I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], whose district includes the great private shipbuilding plants at Newport News, recently made a most amazing argument against the Philadelphia Navy Yard, on the ground that we were going to build the transport Maumee, awarded to the Philadelphia yard in a close contest, below the usual rate.

Perhaps the gentleman himself did not realize the character of the argument he was making. He said, in effect, that Philadelphia should not be permitted to get a contract for a Government ship when it bids so low. In other words, he would not permit the Philadelphia yard to give the Government the benefit of its capacity for good work, the intelligence of its officers, and the skill of its workmen.

If the argument of the gentleman from Virginia were carried to its logical conclusion, the manner of awarding bids throughout the country would be completely changed. Instead of giving contracts to the lowest bidder, we would be giving them to the highest bidder.

At this time, when the air is charged with the electricity of war, when our marines are holding Vera Cruz and sacrificing their lives on the altar of patriotism, I think it appropriate to call attention to the fact that the officers and marines of the Philadelphia Navy Yard are playing their brave part in Mexico at this moment, and that some of these men, who are so brave under fire, are among those who brought this transport contract to the Philadelphia Navy Yard by their skill in times of peace.

We had never before built a canal connecting two oceans, and yet the Panama Canal stands now as a monument to the skill of the Army. The gentleman from Virginia might have said that because the Army men did not have experience in building great canals they should not have been permitted to try their hand at Panama.

The Government navy yards and arsenals are our chief national bulwarks in time of war. We need to develop our navy yards. We can do this without cutting down in any way the usefulness of the private yards. It is absolutely essential to the efficacy of the Navy that certain navy yards be equipped for shipbuilding, and the space for such equipment is larger at League Island than at any other yard.

The ability of our workmen in Philadelphia is known throughout the country. Our fuel, labor, and transportation facilities are unrivaled. The long-established firm of Cramp & Sons has been standing in Philadelphia on the Delaware for many years, and its object in selecting that site—when it had the whole country to choose from—was to be as close as possible to the supplies of iron, steel, oil, coal, lumber, and all the other materials with which Pennsylvania is so rich. In more recent years the same magnet has drawn to the other shore of the Delaware, within a stone's throw of Cramps, the company known as the New York Shipbuilding Co.

The only objection that the gentleman from Virginia can make to the award of the contract is that the price is too low, and the Government will save money by it. In other words, he feels that the private company in his own district may suffer. I sympathize with the gentleman, but it is not likely that the business judgment of this House will support his argument.

Because I have a natural pride in the Philadelphia Navy Yard, which is in the district which I represent, and because I feel that serious injustice has been done to employees of the yard, who worked so hard and with such patriotic pride to win this contract, I feel that I must make answer to the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia. I have such implicit confidence in the character of the men who made the estimates—such faith in their intelligence, skill, and integrity—that were I dealing with them in behalf of any private business, I would be willing to demonstrate my faith by entering a bond to insure that they would carry out the terms of the contract within the estimate fixed by them.

The gentleman from Virginia took the ground that the estimate is far below the cost for building such a ship, and he compares the estimate with those submitted from Mare Island and the New York Navy Yards. He contends that because Philadelphia has never built a ship in its navy yard it has done wrong in bidding $202,306 less than Mare Island and $545,161 less than the New York yard.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia might have made his comparison nearer home. He might have selected Norfolk, in his own State and in his own district, and shown that the estimate of that yard was lower than New York and slightly higher than the lowest private bidder. I fear, however, that the gentleman from Virginia is not so much concerned in having this ship built in a Government yard of experience, such as the Norfolk yard, as he is to have the award made to private shipbuilders in his own district. Possibly he feels that the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. might perform such a service as this even though at a much higher cost. That company offered to build the ship at a figure in excess of the amount which was estimated by the Philadelphia yard, which was willing to include the cost of building slips and equipment provided in this bill.

In the Navy we have constructors who have taken charge of the building of battleships. I have never known any private yards to build one of these ships without the advice and guidance of a naval constructor. It is absurd to say that these constructors do not know their business. The officers who made the estimates for this transport at the Philadelphia Navy Yard were trained and experienced men. They know, as well as the gentleman from Virginia knows, what other yards, Government and private, have been doing, what money could be saved by economical methods in a market so well equipped with skilled labor, fuel, and transportation facilities, and they knew that they could build this transport and provide for building slips and other equipment at a price much lower than the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. That is why they got the contract. They got the contract because they knew their business.

If the House will indulge me for a few moments, I would like to read a letter sent by Secretary Daniels, of the Navy Department, February 14, 1914, to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, in which the Secretary invited attention to the following reasons which influenced him in naming Philadelphia as being in his opinion the most suitable location for the establishment of facilities for the next Government shipbuilding plant. His reasons were as follows:

(a) Labor market: The location of Philadelphia with reference to at least two large private shipbuilding establishments and scores of other manufacturing plants, including locomotive works and other establishments employing large numbers of men, places this city in a unique position with reference to the ready supply of laborers and skilled mechanics. This is the most important consideration in the establishment of a shipbuilding plant. Not only does Philadelphia possess this requisite, but the fact that so much work of a similar character is performed in this vicinity serves to establish a reasonable wage schedule.

(b) Supplies: Philadelphia is a central distributing point for shipbuilding supplies, particularly structural material. This is also an absolute requisite for rapid and economical shipbuilding.

(c) Climate: The absence of severe winter weather for any considerable period makes it practicable to carry on shipbuilding work economically throughout the entire year. A large percentage of the work of building a ship consists of outside work, namely, either in the open or within the hull of the ship itself, and favorable weather conditions are essential for economical construction.

(d) Area: The yard has large acreage, and abundance of room is available not only for building the necessary ways, installing material racks, and laying out the work in the yard, but abundance of room is available for future extensions.

(e) Shop equipments: Except for foundry facilities and certain additional machine tools, the yard is already equipped with shops and tools for carrying on building work, and expenditures for this purpose will be relatively small.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VARE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Are these recommendations of the Philadelphia yard expressions of opinion by the gentleman himself, or do they come from some official source?

Mr. VARE. I am reading a letter addressed to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, by Secretary of the Navy Daniels, under date of February 14, 1914. These favorable recommendations concerning the great Philadelphia Navy Yard are the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy.

In March, 1913, Congress included in the naval bill a clause which reads as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy shall build the battleships authorized in this act in such navy yards as he may designate, and shall build any of the other vessels herein authorized in such navy yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, competing for the construction of any of said vessels have entered into any combination or agreement, the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting the contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

In this section of the act of March 4, 1913, Congress warned the Navy Department against shipbuilding combinations which are believed to have deprived the Government of competition in letting contracts for the construction of vessels. The shipbuilding company at Newport News, which is in the district of the gentleman from Virginia, is credited with being the most powerful and determined organization in the country. If the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. can not build a transport for less than the Philadelphia Navy Yard, why should it boast about it? Is this company so arrogant that it feels that it can demand the Government's business even when its bids are very high? Does it feel that the Philadelphia Navy Yard is a usurper and is not acting in a friendly spirit in giving the Government the benefit of skilled service and economical cost?

Go over the bids for this contract and you will find that Philadelphia carefully estimated each item of expense and was able, because of its proximity to all materials needed in construction and its excellent labor and transportation facilities, to give a lower price on nearly every feature, the total being considerably below the other navy yards. Nevertheless the Norfolk Navy Yard, which could not be so well equipped as the private yards, according to the gentleman from Virginia, bid much lower than New York or Mare Island, but no mention of this was made by the gentleman from Virginia.

It strikes me as being very significant that if the gentleman from Virginia's argument were adopted, the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. would then become the lowest bidder. It is also significant that while the private companies made nine bids, the estimates ranged only from $1,695,000 to $1,931,000. If the navy yards had not come to the Government's rescue, the Newport News Co. would have secured the contract at a cost of $1,695,000 instead of the $1,405,069.99 bid by the Philadelphia yard.

It was not through sentimental reasons that such great industrial concerns as Cramps, the New York Shipbuilding Co., and the Carnegie, Bethlehem, and Midvale steel plants located in Pennsylvania. They went there because of the supply of labor and raw materials. The United States Government will make no mistake in developing the Philadelphia Navy Yard for a great shipbuilding plant for the same reasons.

I am not unaware that this will be of great advantage to the workingmen of Philadelphia. I realize that without any taking away from the work of the private plants we will obtain much employment which otherwise we will not have had. But I insist that merely because the construction of a transport at the Philadelphia Navy Yard and the establishment of an armor-plate plant and central foundry and other improvements for which I have introduced bills would be of benefit to the city is no reason why Congress should reject any of these matters if it is found that the making of such improvements will be of real benefit to the Nation generally.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman indicate the physical conditions at the Philadelphia Navy Yard with regard to the land area and the quality of the land?

Mr. VARE. I shall come to that in a few moments, if the gentleman will reserve that.

The Government will save a great deal of money by making the improvements which I have suggested at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. By building this transport in that navy yard it will be shown that battleships can be built there later on. It is recognized that there must be a great dry dock at Philadelphia and that an armor-plate plant must eventually be established there. Already the board of inspection of the Navy Department has recommended a central foundry at League Island, and I have introduced a bill with that end in view.

I wish to say to the House that the present Philadelphia Navy Yard contains 923 acres, which was given free of charge to the United States Government by the city of Philadelphia on December 12, 1868. In making this gift the city virtually turned over the sum of $403,850 for the site, since that was the sum the city originally paid for it. The old navy yard, which only contained 23 acres, was vacated and sold by the United States Government in December, 1895. The sum of $973,417.44 was realized from the sale and turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MOORE. What kind of land was that when the city dedicated it to the Government?

Mr. VARE. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question, because on our recent visit to Philadelphia the question was asked whether or not this tract of 923 acres of land, for which the city of Philadelphia paid $400,000 more than 40 years ago, was not low swamp land. My answer to that is yes; and because it was low swamp land it had far more value to the Government, as it turned out, than it would have had had it been high and dry land. Some may smile and say, "Why is that?"

The answer is that at that time the Government was removing Windmill and Smith Islands, in the Delaware River opposite the business part of the city. They had advertised for contracts for the removal of 7,000,000 yards of earth. They would have had to carry this earth approximately 15 miles to a place where they could dump it; but, by reason of the Government owning this 923 acres of low land, they received bids for the dredging of these islands for 50 per cent of what it would have cost had not the Government owned this low ground. Therefore the city of Philadelphia not only gave this 923 acres of land, which cost them $400,000, but they gave the Government a convenient dump, which saved nearly $1,000,000 in the removal of these islands in the Delaware River.

Mr. MOORE. What is the value of the land to-day?

Mr. VARE. The present Philadelphia Navy Yard, consisting of 923 acres, with the buildings, improvements, and so forth, is assessed at $10,000,000; and I submit that, inasmuch as the city of Philadelphia has given this great tract of land to the United States Government, it has a right to expect that the best use will be made of it for the benefit of the Nation at large.

The city of Philadelphia is now engaged in work which will vastly increase the value of the Government property. It is building a boulevard at a cost of $3,000,000; it has established League Island Park at a cost of $3,000,000. The city and railroads together are spending $20,000,000 for improved railroad facilities. The State of Pennsylvania, incidentally, is about to authorize $25,000,000 for the improvement of the port of Philadelphia; and inasmuch as the policy of the present Democratic administration is declared to be "economy and efficiency," I do not see how the majority in this House can afford to turn away from this principle by refusing the improvements which I have suggested at the Philadelphia Navy Yard.

In conclusion, I merely wish to say that I am willing to leave it to the common sense and business judgment of the House whether the fact that we have skilled workmen, unparalleled transportation and raw-material facilities, and that we are ideally located from a geographical standpoint, thus being able to do work for the Government at a lower price than the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., is sufficient grounds for denying the United States the economies which the Philadelphia Navy Yard offers in the construction of the transport, and the other benefits which I promise if the further improvements which I have suggested are made. [Applause.]

[1] If tried at Lewes, Del.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I was thrilled by the eloquent and able tribute paid to the Navy by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. I have always had a high respect for the Navy. I have always thought that the defense of this country and the protection of the rights of the people of this country abroad rested mainly upon the Navy. It is an apparent fact that we are isolated from other nations and that we are not dependent so much upon our Army as we are upon the Navy. The Navy and its efficiency have always been a matter of pride with the American people.

I stand, and I believe the American people stand with this committee in favoring something substantial in the way of a naval program. I believe the people of this country would not accept less than the two-battleship program proposed by Secretary Daniels and approved by this committee. I believe the people of this country would have approved a continuation all along of the policy of two battleships, adopted by former administrations, and I believe a great mistake was made when that policy was temporarily abandoned. The people expect our Navy to retain its rank and place among the navies of the world.

It seems to me, however, that in the distribution of the fleet of this country the department has not given that consideration to the Pacific coast that ought to be given. All of our battleships are kept on the Atlantic Ocean. It may be true that the unit formation is important and that we must depend upon having them together in order to make them strong. But I believe more consideration by some kind of an arrangement should be given to the Pacific coast. If we should engage in a naval contest with a foreign nation, we are not likely to have serious trouble on the Atlantic Ocean. The possible naval conflicts that are to come will be in the Pacific Ocean. No one believes there is a prospect of trouble that will come on the Atlantic Ocean. As we consider the commercial operations and industrial enterprises of the future, the merchant ships to fly the flag of this Nation on the water, we are bound to recognize that the great bulk of all of that progress and activity is going to be in the Pacific Ocean and the great maritime development of the future is going to be in the Pacific. That is where we have to look for industrial expansion; that is where we have to look out for more trade; that is where we are going to be called upon to fight the real naval battles, if at all.

I believe that we ought to have battleships on the Pacific Ocean. We have not one on the Pacific coast. They are all on the Atlantic coast, where they are not generally needed and where there is no immediate demand for them. We saw 16 battleships on their way to pay a friendly visit to Japan come to the Puget Sound Navy Yard to be docked, and before they came there the Navy Department inquired whether or not there were sufficient anchorage facilities to take care of them. Admiral Burwell, who was commandant of the navy yard, wired back that there were sufficient anchorage facilities to take care of not only the American fleet but all the fleets of the world in Puget Sound. The Bremerton Navy Yard made a splendid showing for itself.

Mr. Chairman, I am deeply interested in the Navy. Until a little over a year ago my entire residence in the State of Washington has been in the little cities of Charleston and Bremerton, the home of the Puget Sound Naval Station. I am very intimately acquainted with a large group of men working in this navy yard. So I am interested as much in navy yards as in the ships, but, after all, my interest in the yards and the ships has first of all to do with the human element.

I believe greater consideration should be given the men who work in these yards. They are not adequately consulted on many matters of policy where their service and advice would be of inestimable value. In the first place, the naval officers placed at our yards to take charge of the entire management and mechanical construction generally live apart from the men. I am one of those who believe it is all wrong to make the naval officers commandants of the navy yards with the superintending power of managers of construction, repair, manufacturing, and the employers of labor. If officers are to be retained as commandants, then these other duties ought to be separated from that office.

I recall three commandants of the Puget Sound Naval Station whom I have known. They were all admirals. Our Navy is efficient as a navy, and I do not have it in my heart to detract from the worth of or the credit that is due our Navy officers. Their life is not all ease, and they are a faithful set of men, who command my respect, but that respect is more pronounced when considering them as naval officers than as managers of naval manufacturing plants. One of these admiral commandants of the Puget Sound Naval Station was Admiral W. T. Burwell. He was about as much of a success as could be expected of the naval officer in such a position; and the people of the navy-yard towns out there have a tender spot in their hearts for Admiral Burwell. He came and he went. Prohibited by naval rules from participating in local issues, he was never fully identified with the real workings of the yard, nor did he ever get well acquainted with the needs of the men in the yard, although he knew well conditions aboard ship. He was well liked, but was arbitrary, like all naval officers. I remember one occasion when I called him up by phone after yard hours. I was reporting locally for the Seattle Post Intelligencer. A man had been killed in the yard and I wanted facts. He came to the phone and started off the conversation by asking if I did not know better than to call him up over phone, and that after hours. I answered quickly that if he wanted to refuse the facts, I would so report, but that I would not listen to his lecture. He then told me the facts.

Admiral John Rodgers was another commandant. He was universally known as "Sleepy John." If he had, by some preference decree of stockholders or otherwise, been assigned to manage the Moran yards at Seattle, the directors of that corporation would have considered themselves by far the winners to have paid him $10,000 a year extra not to serve. He had no conception of the duty of a manager of a manufacturing plant. The less said the better. There was no room whatever for argument.

Then came Admiral V. L. Cottman, now retired. A vigorous, dashing little admiral of genuine worth and many progressive ideas. Ability—yes. Good sense and good judgment—yes. Morality and integrity—yes. But it takes more than that to be a manager of a great manufacturing plant—an industrial plant, if you please. Naval Academy by congressional favor, then through all the grades in the Navy up to admiral, with retirement on life pay just ahead; what does such a one know about the needs, the demands of 2,000 workmen in a navy yard? What does he know about steam engineering, about construction and repair? Oh, he knows when a job is well done, like he knows when a ship is making 15 knots per hour, but that does not mean that he knows how the job is done or the elements that enter into its construction.

Then there is under these admirals a force of uniformed officers who serve to make construction expensive by increasing its cost; but, so far as being of any service about the manufacturing plant is concerned, they are simply a burden. There was recently published, so I am informed by letter, in a Seattle newspaper the picture of the Puget Sound Naval Station admiral and his supervising force, composed of some 68 officers. All of these are charged up to the yard as a part of the overhead charges. They have about 60 planners and estimators. Then come about a hundred storemen and material men, and about 20 inspectors. All of these are not officers of the Navy, but it is that kind of a bungled mass of incongruities that are the natural outgrowth of itinerant admirals to manage the great naval manufacturing plants of Uncle Sam. All these are nonproducers.

Next, the yard has about a hundred foremen and masters. Here is where the real superintending begins, but by this time we have probably 1 nonproducer to every 3 producers. These master workmen have to work both ways—both the officers above and the workmen below. I do not take the position that officers should not be stationed at navy yards as naval constructors and inspectors to learn what goes into a ship and to be prepared and informed as to every detail, but I do say that about 9 out of every 10 officers now at the navy yards of the country could do the Government a great deal more and better service by becoming learners under the tutelage of master mechanics and other practical men than by attempting to direct the actions of these men. In such case the Navy Department would learn that stop watches and Taylor systems were not needed, for the efficiency of the yards would be greatly enhanced. In many cases naval officers have not been taught how to count the cost and conserve the efficiency and independence of workmen.

We have master mechanics at the Puget Sound yard that have been there for 10 years or more. They know more about the work of the yard than an admiral could possibly learn unless he had devoted himself to the work as these masters have; yet when the guns fire a salute to the new admiral commandant these mechanics have to go to the officer just from the sea for orders. I believe the naval manufacturing plants ought to be relieved of this burden, and their efficiency and economy would be thereby enhanced.

There is no reason why the wants of the workmen should not be considered by men who sympathize with them and who know their wants as well as their work. Sympathy, mutual help, human kindness, and mutual understanding are essential in a shop as well as in a home. I am loath to criticize the Navy Department. I so heartily admire the able Secretary, Mr. Daniels, and the Assistant, Mr. Roosevelt—one is superb and the other bully—that I do not want to criticize; but it is plain that no Secretary can get away from the machine that envelops him.

I believe that our navy yards would be more efficient, would be more competent in turning out work economically if there was some kind of an arrangement for a permanent manager who knew business methods, who was familiar with dealing with workingmen, and who could not only look out for discipline among the enlisted men, which is not the only thing to consider, but the construction of ships that would meet the demands of the Navy and would unify the enterprise and the plans with certain defined business ideas in view.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman says that in his opinion naval officers are not competent to manage great industrial enterprises. I wonder whether the gentleman has visited and studied the great powder plant at Indianhead; and if so, what is his judgment? That is managed by a naval officer. When I was there the officer in charge only the week before had been in command of a torpedo-boat destroyer. I think I never saw a more perfectly managed plant than I found there.

Mr. BRYAN. I did not mean to make the broad statement that naval officers are not competent to manage an enterprise. The plant the gentleman alludes to is a new one. I do not doubt that there has been good consecutive work by one officer after another with a definite plan in view, and the plant has proven that the Government can manufacture powder cheaper than private plants, or at least at less than private plants have been charging. I do not say that the naval officers are incompetent; I believe that they are very competent men. Their education has been such as to enable them to know a great deal about these things, but I do not believe that they know, as a rule, how to manage a manufacturing plant. I believe that naval instructors ought to be there and see that everything in connection with the construction of a battleship is correct, but I can not reconcile my ideas of balancing dollar against dollar in the construction of a battleship with the ordinary management by a naval officer. That system promotes a large volume of overhead charges that are levied against the product of the plant. When you come to compare the operation of the plant in building ships with building at private yards all of these overhead charges are included, and it is said that the Government can not construct battleships as cheaply as the private yards.

Now, we find that the Government, in the great reclamation projects, can perform the duty as cheaply as private enterprise; it can remove the dirt and build canals as cheaply as private enterprise. We find the powder plant that the gentleman alluded to is a new plant, and perhaps that is an exception to the rule, and perhaps it weakens my argument; but, nevertheless, the fundamental fact remains that private shipyards engaged in the manufacture of ships for profit would not accept the ordinary naval management.

SECRETARY DANIELS AT THE PUGET SOUND NAVAL STATION.

Secretary Daniels was out on the Pacific coast a few months ago. The men in the yard concluded that the time would be opportune to talk fully over yard matters with the Secretary. Was he not coming to study thoroughly yard conditions? Were they not as much a part of the yard as were the machines? And they could talk and tell him something. So they organized themselves and appointed Mr. F. A. Smith secretary of their committee. The following correspondence unfolds their plans:

BREMERTON, WASH., July 7, 1913.

V. L. COTTMAN,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy,
Commandant Navy Yard, Puget Sound.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed by a joint committee of workmen from the various trades employed in the navy yard, Puget Sound, to respectfully request that you will, at the earliest convenient moment, transmit the inclosed invitation to the honorable Secretary of the Navy.

It is the desire of this committee to arrange a meeting with the Secretary of the Navy, in conformance with statements accredited to him in which he has promised to personally take up matters of wages and working conditions at navy yards while upon his tour of inspection.

It has been carefully estimated that at least three hours will be required to properly present and discuss the above matters as they affect the employees at this navy yard.

If the local schedule covering his visit here upon July 18 interferes with this feature of his inspection trip, we desire to learn his pleasure regarding the hours during which he can meet this committee, so that suitable arrangements may be made for an assembly hall in the city of Bremerton.

Respectfully,

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee.

BREMERTON, WASH., July 7, 1913.

HON. JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy
(Through Rear Admiral V. L. Cottman, commandant, navy yard, Puget Sound).

DEAR SIR: I am instructed by a large joint committee of workmen from the various trades employed in the navy yard, Puget Sound, to respectfully invite you to meet with the above committee while upon your inspection trip to this station, and at that time personally take up the matter of wages and working conditions under the efficiency system.

It has been carefully estimated that at least three hours will be required to properly present and discuss the above matters as they affect the employees at this navy yard.

A local schedule has recently been published covering your visit here upon July 18, in which no opportunity is afforded for a meeting with employees during the hours between your arrival at 10 a. m. and departure at 4.45 p. m.

We therefore very much desire to learn your pleasure as to the hours which you can meet this committee of employees, so that an important feature of your inspection trip may be entered into fully, and that suitable arrangements may be made for an assembly hall in the city of Bremerton.

Respectfully,

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee.

The admiral answers and tenders his help, which no doubt was well meant, but was certainly not included in the plans of the workmen:

BREMERTON, WASH., July 9, 1913.

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee of Workmen.

DEAR SIR: Receipt this day is acknowledged of your communication of July 7, with inclosure for Secretary of the Navy, which was immediately forwarded to the Secretary at Washington, D. C. A night letter will also be sent advising him of your request.

The yard workmen have not previously asked for any interview with me or with the Secretary of the Navy, consequently no such provision was made in the schedule for his visit July 18, referred to in your letter.

Shall be pleased to receive from you a written statement covering the subject you desire to discuss with the Secretary of Navy, and would like to know how many of the navy-yard employees your committee represents.

The commandant has no objection whatever to discussing the management of this navy yard with any properly constituted committee of the workmen or anyone else, nor has he any objection to assist such a committee in obtaining an interview with the Secretary of the Navy concerning said management. On the contrary, the commandant would be pleased to have every employee of the yard study and understand the Navy Department system of management, which is being strictly observed at this navy yard, and is willing to elucidate the management, for the more familiar the employees become with this Navy Department system the better they will be prepared to carry it out contentedly, and improvements in results will surely follow—beneficial to the workmen and to the Navy.

The commandant is desirous of receiving assistance from the workmen to increase the efficiency of this establishment, and has always considered carefully every recommendation and complaint brought to his notice in a proper manner, and is willing to adopt, with the department's sanction, anything that will increase efficiency and benefit the workmen.

Respectfully,

V. L. COTTMAN,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy, Commandant.

Forget about an assembly hall. Meet in office building under my jurisdiction. Write down every word and give me a copy in advance.

NAVY YARD,
Puget Sound, Wash., July 14, 1913.

SECRETARY WORKMEN'S COMMITTEE.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed is copy of telegram sent to Secretary of the Navy and his reply thereto.

Arrangements will be made for the Secretary of the Navy to meet your committee at 2 p. m. in the office building in navy yard on July 18, 1913, for not more than half an hour, at which time you will please deliver to him the views of the workmen in writing, and I shall be much obliged to you if you will furnish me with a copy.

Please inform me of the number of workmen on the committee to meet the Secretary of the Navy, also the number of employees represented by the committee.

If I can be of any assistance to the committee in preparing their case I am at your service, and I shall be pleased to meet your committee prior to the visit to the yard of Secretary Daniels to ascertain your views and put you right as to the methods and merits of the Navy Department system of management and to explain any steps therein that seem to meet with the disapproval of some of the workmen.

Respectfully,

V. L. COTTMAN,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy, Commandant.

The admiral suggests his views; half hour will do.

[Telegram.]

NAVY YARD,
Puget Sound, Wash., July 9, 1913.

SECRETARY NAVY,
Washington, D. C.:

Committee of workmen from various trades, through their secretary, request three hours with you for discussion of wages and working conditions under the efficiency system so that an important feature of your inspection trip may be entered into fully. No previous similar request or complaint has been made. Have informed committee that commandant was willing to have you discuss with them the management here and would assist in obtaining an interview with you and requested that they make written statement of subjects they desire to discuss and of the number of employees represented by the committee. They request you set the time so they can make necessary arrangements for an assembly hall in Bremerton. Suggest half an hour in navy yard July 18.

COTTMAN.

Yes; half hour is enough. Five hours is reserved Seattle engagements, for which the Secretary certainly can not be criticized.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 12, 1913.

COMMANDANT, NAVY YARD,
Puget Sound, Wash.:

Replying to your telegram in regard to committee of workmen, my time very much taken up, but on account of importance of this subject will ask you to arrange for not more than half an hour with them some time during my trip to the yard; but have them prepare their views in writing so that I may take them with me.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The committee insist on three hours; tell some of the tremendous yard propositions to be considered, including the different trades involved, and courteously renew the invitation and propose a hall in Bremerton where the employees want to meet the Secretary. Thirty minutes, they assure the admiral, will be entirely insufficient time.

BREMERTON, WASH., July 14, 1913.

Hon. JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the United States Navy.
(Through Rear Admiral Cottman, Commandant Navy Yard, Puget Sound.)

DEAR SIR: The joint committee of workmen in the navy yard, Puget Sound, have received to-day from the commandant a copy of your telegram in response to our invitation for a three hours' interview.

He is authorized to arrange a meeting for not more than half an hour with the committee, this being in accordance with his suggestion made in forwarding our invitation.

We regret to say that this committee deems 30 minutes too limited time in which to present a comprehensive survey of working conditions, as they apply to all trades at this navy yard, and we have decided to respectfully decline the 30 minutes' interview as proposed.

We still desire to take up various matters, but we are reluctant to waste any of your time unless these matters can be presented in a thorough manner from our standpoint; otherwise, they may be brushed aside with a general statement and no good would be accomplished.

The joint committee is composed of representatives from the following occupations:

Blacksmiths, boiler makers, coppersmiths, drillers, electricians, laborers, machinists, machinists' helpers, molders, painters, painters' helpers, pattern makers, pipe coverers, pipe fitters, power plant, riveters, sailmakers, sheet-metal workers, ship fitters, and shipwrights.

This committee has at all times only the best interests of the service at heart in any action they may take.

We would hereby renew our former invitation for an interview of three hours' duration, and express the hope that the business and social arrangements already perfected for your visit to the navy yard will permit an acceptance of same.

We would be glad to learn your pleasure at any early moment, so that we may arrange a mass meeting of all employees and citizens in a public hall in Bremerton upon the evening of July 18.

Should you be unable to attend at that time, then the meeting will not be held, and the committee will be unable to present the various matters we have in mind, but will perhaps put them in written form for submission at a later date.

In case the extended consideration can not be given, we request that you will give especial attention to two matters at least which apply to the working conditions of practically all employees of this navy yard.

We consider the so-called efficiency record of the individual workmen as a matter of great importance, since that record is based upon a very unreliable system of estimates and invoices a multitude of conditions which are entirely beyond the workman's control, and yet he is told that his chances of a better rating or permanent employment depend upon it.

An earlier system, which embraced an offensive time study of workmen by the use of a stop watch, was abolished by an order from a former Secretary of the Navy.

We are prepared to show that the present system is equally obnoxious and unfair, and we do not believe that it can be defended by anyone who will closely examine the conditions under which it must operate at this yard.

We would request that the Secretary of the Navy abolish as soon as possible this obnoxious record.

We would also request that a board be convened to take up matters upon the subject of wages.

Respectfully,

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee.

"The names of all the members of your committee."—The admiral.

NAVY YARD,
Puget Sound, Wash., July 15, 1913.

The SECRETARY,
Yard Workmen's Committee, Bremerton, Wash.

SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your communication of July 14, 1913, with inclosure for Secretary of the Navy, Josephus Daniels, which will be delivered to him upon his arrival in Seattle to-morrow night.

It is noted that you decline the half-hour interview the Secretary directed me to arrange for on the day of his visit to the yard, July 18.

You failed to reply to the inquiry in my letter of July 14, 1913, as to the number of men on your committee and the number of yard employees represented by your committee, and I shall be much obliged for this information, and in addition I would like the names of the members of your committee.

As you state, the record of the individual workmen is a matter of great importance both to him and to the management, and the management has been working on this for a long time and hopes to reach results satisfactory to the workman and to the management.

The records for outside workmen, based upon estimates, have not been used for rating or discharge of men, as it has not been running a sufficient length of time and has not been perfected, consequently, as no use has been made of it as yet, it can not be obnoxious.

The question of manner of handling wages is fixed by law, and whilst the commandant has no objection to a special board being designated by the Secretary, he believes the present method just and fair, though it might be supplemented by an investigation of wages in the immediate vicinity by the Department of Labor as a guide to the Navy Yard Wage Board.

The commandant is always ready to receive and investigate any special complaints and will be glad to make an appointment to meet your committee or any other committee to hear any alleged grievances, and will carefully investigate any that are brought to his attention, and besides is willing to explain the workings of the Navy Department system, believing that all grievances will be dissipated by elucidation of all the facts.

Please present your grievances specifically and all data pertaining thereto in writing to the commandant in order that he may investigate and explain to your committee the workings of the Navy Department system of management.

Respectfully,

V. L. COTTMAN,
Rear Admiral, United States Navy, Commandant.

Your kind offer received with tremendous gratitude. It is observed that the names of members were not furnished.

BREMERTON, WASH., July 16, 1913.

Rear Admiral V. L. COTTMAN,
United States Navy, Commandant Navy Yard, Puget Sound.

DEAR SIR: Receipt is hereby acknowledged of your favor under date of July 15, 1913, containing announcement that our communication to the Secretary of the Navy had been duly forwarded so as to reach him upon his arrival in Seattle, for which you will kindly accept our thanks.

It is noted that failure was made to reply, in previous communication, to the inquiry as to the names of all members of this joint committee and the number of men represented by them.

The further statements and suggestions contained in the above favor have been carefully noted, together with the kind expression of willingness by the commandant to elucidate the workings of the Navy Department system of improved management, in reply to which I would say that same will be brought to the attention of the members of the joint committee at their next meeting.

Respectfully,

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee.

The committee of workmen pursue the only sensible course. It is plain they did not want Admiral Cottman to "elucidate" or "explain the workings" to them. They want to explain firsthand to the Secretary, so they give up the meeting with the Secretary and agree to submit their views in writing. That was the best they could do. One thing would be gained, anyway. They would have a direct hearing with a big-hearted, generous man, who had the well-merited reputation of being a real Democrat—the Secretary.

BREMERTON, WASH., August 30, 1913.

Rear Admiral V. L. COTTMAN,
Commandant Navy Yard, Puget Sound.

SIR: Please find herewith a communication addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, relative to wages and working conditions at this navy yard, which we would thank you to kindly forward.

A duplicate copy is also inclosed for the commandant's personal disposal.

Replying to your favor of July 15, containing an offer to meet members of this committee and explain features of the Navy Department system of improved management, I am instructed to request that instead of an interview being held that the full details of the above system as they apply to individual workmen at this navy yard may be posted conspicuously upon the official bulletin boards. The committee believes that this will be much more satisfactory, since no employee in the yard will then be compelled to depend upon hearsay as to the actual features of the system under which he is working.

Respectfully,

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee.

BREMERTON, WASH., August 30, 1913.

Hon. JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Secretary of Navy.
(Through Rear Admiral V. L. Cottman, Commandant Navy Yard, Puget Sound.)

SIR: Please find herewith a written summary of the matters relative to wages and working conditions which the joint committee of workmen at the Puget Sound Navy Yard desired to bring to your attention in person during your recent inspection trip to the navy yard. As no interview covering these matters was held at that time, I am instructed to forward them for your information and for such action as you may deem proper upon the requests contained therein.

I am also instructed to request an acknowledgment of their receipt in order that the committee may be informed of their arrival at the intended destination.

Respectfully,

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee.

The following is the statement they submitted to the Secretary. It took much patient work to prepare it and expense to make the necessary copies; but it meant much to them to have the Secretary consider these matters; their daily bread was involved. I am going to put it all in the RECORD. It will be of great interest to navy-yard employees all over the country. I know it is lengthy, but it is not as lengthy as Secretary Redfield's report on shingles, and that went in the RECORD, and I am glad it did. The navy-yard employees are surely worth as much as the tariff on shingles, especially since shingles are on the free list.

From: Committee of workmen, navy yard, Puget Sound.
To: Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: Working conditions and wages.

INTRODUCTORY.

A few weeks before the announced date (July 18, 1913) that the Secretary of the Navy would visit the navy yard, Puget Sound, to make a careful personal investigation of this station, a large joint committee of representative men from the various occupations in the yard met and adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas Hon. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, will visit the Puget Sound Navy Yard in the near future upon an inspection trip; and

"Whereas he has promised to personally take up the matter of wages paid and the working conditions in force at the various navy yards visited; and

"Whereas we know of no business of greater importance to demand his attention than a careful consideration of unsatisfactory conditions existing since the individual-record system was installed and the last adjustment of wages was made: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That a committee of two men be chosen from each trade employed in the navy yard to present the various grievances to him; and be it further

"Resolved, That a request be made, through the commandant, for an interview between the Secretary of the Navy and the above committee of not less than three hours' duration, during which time these matters may be thoroughly discussed and, if possible, a definite decision be rendered upon them; and be it also

"Resolved, That a copy of the above resolutions be presented to the local papers for publication."

The above action was taken as a result of knowledge acquired through press dispatches and otherwise that the Secretary had welcomed conferences with committees of workmen at the navy yards and stations which he had recently inspected on the Atlantic coast, and was due primarily to repeated press dispatches that he would personally take up matters of wages and conditions with employees of this yard.

Realizing that the navy yard, Puget Sound, is located at a great distance from Navy Department headquarters in Washington, D. C., and consequently that it is difficult for the workmen to fully present matters to the department from their own standpoint without doing so in a formal complaint, this committee decided to take up the various matters and present them informally, but exhaustively, to the Secretary of the Navy in person, for his information, so that these matters could be weighed carefully in conjunction with similar information already received while at eastern yards and stations.

Having in mind the fact that it had repeatedly been announced that the Secretary would spend three days in thoroughly inspecting the navy yard at Puget Sound, this committee deemed it an entirely reasonable request to ask for an interview of three hours' duration.

We did not contemplate using this time at the expense of the Government, but it was our purpose to hold a public meeting during the evening in the largest assembly hall in the city of Bremerton, to which all citizens would be invited.

It was then the intention to have our views presented by a series of truly representative employees who have had long service in the navy yard, and who would stand forth and make their statements under the restraining influence of the presence of many people who could tell whether it were the truth, and at the same time the speakers would be protected from future misquotation of their statements through the fact of many persons hearing the original. The speaker completing his statement by saying: "Mr. Secretary, the details of the Navy Department system of improved management, as they apply specifically to individual workmen, have never been published at this yard, or made clear to me, and I realize that they are not settled since they are constantly being changed, and that workmen in different divisions are affected by widely different features. I can not then say that the foregoing incident either conforms or conflicts with the system; but I speak of personal knowledge in saying that this thing happened to me in this navy yard a short time ago, and I believe that I am the best witness as to the impression created by it, and I say that it is obnoxious to me."

This meeting would be controlled by a competent chairman who would see that no personalities were engaged in.

It was expected that about two hours would be used in presenting the various matters, and it was not the intention to place the Secretary of the Navy in an embarrassing position by demanding a definite reply to each question at once, but a brief would have been made from stenographic notes of the meeting and this brief forwarded to the Navy Department for consideration at their convenience.

The Secretary of the Navy would then have been invited to address the audience for such time and upon whatsoever subject he chose.

It may be said at this time that the committee never did seriously consider a proposition of holding a brief interview in the navy yard.

First. Because the time would be too short to properly present the case.

We understand that photographs exist of all buildings and docks and incidental features relating to the inanimate equipment at this yard, but we know of no better way to present a picture of the mental attitude belonging to the workmen than was contemplated by the extended interview which they sought.

Second. This was the workmen's subject, and they desired to handle it themselves.

Some of them have had previous experience at hearings in the navy yard, in which they have appeared as committee from their trade before the wage board, and upon said committee asking a leading question, they were bluntly informed, "You are here to answer questions, and not to ask them." In another instance several employees were threatened with discharge for having been candidates for municipal office in Bremerton, permission to do so having been requested from the Navy Department, and no refusal having been made. During this hearing one of the candidates sought to ask a question, and was rebuked by the management in the following words, "Shut up; we will do the talking, and if we care to hear from you we will say so."

We desire no controversy, and you will see that a tense situation might easily arise, so that a yard meeting would not be entered into with the right spirit and open minds upon either side.

You will doubtless agree that he is no enemy of his country who tries to honestly point out his views upon a question of interest to him, and that in doing so men should not be stigmatized with the statement that they are agitators. In the present case this statement is neither a fact nor would such a statement heal the matter even were it true.

This committee feels that some effort has been made to thwart their laudable purpose in presenting their views to the Secretary of the Navy, who is the chief reviewing officer upon matters relating to wages and working conditions at all navy yards, yet we have decided to persevere in our purpose and try to be temperate in doing so, and if reprisals are made from any direction, we shall immediately and directly call same to the attention of the Secretary of the Navy and ask for prompt redress.

This committee deeply regrets that the business and social arrangements which had previously been made for the honorable Secretary of the Navy while in this vicinity prevented him giving the necessary time for an extended interview, and therefore that no meeting took place.

We also sincerely believe that the Secretary of the Navy equally regrets that failure met our plan, as outlined above, and we hasten to assure him that this committee does not hold him responsible in any manner for such failure. We fully appreciate that a Cabinet officer, who is one of the advisers to the President of the United States, must of necessity seek information upon a multitude of questions of great import to the Government, even though the subject matter may be outside the department which has been particularly intrusted to him, and that there are many demands upon his time which he is unable to meet while upon a hasty trip at a considerable distance from home.

It is, then, perhaps reasonable to assume that in such a position one might easily hold in abeyance matters pertaining to his own department, knowing that he possessed means of considering them at a more opportune time.

We trust you will not be less willing to carefully investigate these matters, because they are inherited from a former administration.

From the mass of data at hand, we will endeavor to outline, briefly as possible, some of the matters which we have in mind.

HOW IS INDIVIDUAL EFFICIENCY RECORD SECURED?

The efficiency of a workman is based upon an unreliable system of time estimates.

It is determined by the actual time spent in the performance of a given task as compared with the time estimated as being necessary. A card-index system is then maintained upon which the average of each individual workman is recorded, and this is called his percentage of efficiency.

WHAT IS THE PURPOSE?

We have been informed that those workmen having the highest efficiency will be given the preference in permanency of employment and in promotion to better positions, while those whose percentage goes below some (unstated) figure will be automatically discharged.

HOW ARE THE ESTIMATES SECURED?

A large force of employees of various trades and ratings are maintained in what is called an estimating section, and they are expected to place a time estimate upon every job order that is issued. A careful estimator will, of course, make his estimate with the idea of all material being at hand and that the work will be performed under favorable circumstances; but it is sometimes more difficult to prophesy future events than it is to do the work, and it is really impossible for the best estimator in the world to take into consideration all the obstacles which are very apt to confront the workman when he gets on the job.

Some instances of this will be given later on.

Yet the accumulated burden of these errors must be borne by the workman in his struggle against time in securing a high efficiency.

DOES THE ESTIMATE REMAIN AS ORIGINALLY ESTABLISHED?

The estimated time is easily "corrected" before the work starts, during its progress, or after it has been completed; in fact, it can be changed any old time; and the workman whose efficiency record depends upon it may never know the facts as to whether extensions have been granted or if a new estimate has been made.

IN SOME SHOPS A SECOND ESTIMATE IS ALWAYS MADE.

The original estimates have proven so unreliable that it is now the custom in some shops to totally ignore them and have a new estimate made. This may be of benefit in correcting some errors, but it goes further than that, for in many instances it causes a man to be in continual competition with himself—even after he has defeated all others. Under a scientific system it would seem that a certain amount of time would be allowed for a certain piece of work, but the way it is operated at present the time allowed depends upon the man who is going to do the work; it is estimated according to the man, his skill, speed, etc., and one man may be given a greater time allowance upon the same work.

In another instance, a time has been set upon a job which would be reasonable under certain circumstances, but the man who gets it to do must use machines and methods that were not contemplated by the estimator.

DOES THE WORKMAN KNOW THE AMOUNT OF TIME ESTIMATED ON HIS JOB?

At one time an order was issued that if there was insufficient time allowed, the leading man should call it to the attention of the office immediately, but at present—in the shops where advanced steps have been taken with the system—the workman does not know, neither does the leading man know, how much time has been allowed; and thus there is no opportunity for a workman to protest against the certainty of getting a low efficiency mark.

In other shops the estimate may be made in the first place by a man who is not familiar with the work, and the time is then entered upon the job order by means of symbols which are unintelligible to the workman, and leave him ignorant of the conditions under which he is working.

We believe that the system should give information to the man instead of keeping it away from him, and he would thus be able to point out mistakes in the estimated time before it is too late and his efficiency has been recorded.

In other shops an estimate has been made upon the capacity of certain machines; for instance, punch a certain number of holes in a given time. The men who work upon outside work and do not punch holes during the month are simply given an arbitrary percentage rating which is not based upon any estimates at all.

DO WORKMEN OBJECT TO THE ESTIMATING FEATURE.

The workmen have no objection to the estimating system, as such. We believe that it has advantages to the management in the way of getting lists of material, etc., even though it sometimes takes longer to estimate and get out an analysis of a job than it does to do the actual work.

For instance, a certain launch needed repairs to coal bunker; an estimator spent four hours on the job, and then a leading sheet-metal worker looked the job over for half an hour, and then, later, both the estimator and the leading-man sheet-metal worker spent half an hour together in looking it over. When the work was assigned to a workman he completed the entire job in two hours.

With sufficient experience the estimator may be expected to reach the high efficiency possessed by the garage proprietor, as shown below:

OWNER. What will it cost to repair this car of mine?

GARAGE PROPRIETOR. What ails it?

OWNER. I don't know.

GARAGE PROPRIETOR. Thirty-four dollars and sixty-five cents.

The workmen do not object to the estimates being made, but we emphatically object to having our so-called efficiency based upon them.

SOME OF THE EFFICIENCY STANDARDS.

We object to having our efficiency marked on jobs where we can not produce 100 per cent by reason of other men being in our way, and where obstacles are multiplied against us over which we have no control, i. e., Burnside job. A gang of men are to remove a bulkhead adjacent to the fire and engine rooms, and to do this work they must have a scaffold to work on—another gang of men are working to cut the boilers in sections, and a third gang is removing the sections.

While the first gang is cutting out rivets, the second gang is constantly dodging the flying rivets as they are backed out of the bulkhead. As soon as a section of the boiler is cut adrift, the riggers come along; their job order gives them one hour to remove the section, and if the scaffold is in the way down comes the scaffold, and all hands in the vicinity apply the first law of nature. Over these things the workman has no control, yet his efficiency depends upon the length of time it takes him to complete the work, and the time only, and not the conditions, are recorded upon the master cards.

The installation of new boilers, new pumps, new shafting, new piping, new foundations, new floors and bulkhead, with consequent fitting, drilling, reaming, and riveting, are even worse in establishing a workman's efficiency by the time-limit master cards where scores of men from different divisions are pitted against each other in a small space to do their own work, regardless of the other fellow; and all at the same time, and all in each other's way, how can any one of them produce 100 per cent? It is a question of the survival of the fittest, and the man who can, by physical force or otherwise, hold his fellow workers at bay while he accomplishes his work is the man with the highest percentage. We do not object to doing the work any way the supervisory force directs, but we do object to being graded on percentage where conditions under which we work do not permit us to accomplish good results, and our record stands entirely upon the amount of time consumed.

To produce 100 per cent efficiency a gang of riveters must drive 480 five-eighths inch rivets on a bulkhead in eight hours, or one every minute, while all around, above, and below are coppersmiths at work; and riggers installing large fire mains; electricians installing conduit; machinists installing condensers and pumps; ship fitters installing foundations and floors, and floor supports; at the same time other riggers are lowering into place large tanks and pumps, heavy machinery, sections of boilers which require that the whole compartment shall be clear of scaffolding and obstructions; consequently, all hands must get out of the way until these large pieces are landed, and every minute lost means a reduction in efficiency on the master card.

The present system records quantity, but not quality, and the workman who can get the work off his hands on or below the estimated time elevates his efficiency, while the man who does a better job does so at the expense of his percentage as it is recorded on the efficiency card.

Did the estimator who made the analysis of the work in the central station of the West Virginia know of the confusion there would be on account of congestion? There is about 80 square feet of deck room in this compartment and there were from 15 to 20 workmen in it during the time the work was done. There were ship fitters attempting to make templets for the lagging; drillers trying to secure the sheet metal, drilling for conduit, pipe, and instruments; electricians running conduit; pipe fitters putting up voice pipes and water mains; ordnance men installing range indicators; joiners installing tables and cleating up wire, and all the time there were workmen pushing, shoving, and squeezing their way through this mass of disgruntled competitors for efficiency. Did the estimator guess within 25 per cent of the obstacles to be overcome? We refer you to the record in central planning office.

The estimator, when making analysis of a job, figures on a certain kind of material being used and assumes that the material will be on hand when the job is started. For instance, Burnside radio station, time allowed, 1 man 2 days (extended to 7 days). First three days spent in getting material on job. Some instruments being manufactured not complete until four days after job was started. May we ask, was it the fault of the estimator, the storehouse keeper, the manufacturing department, or the workman that the estimated time was less than 50 per cent of the actual time required? Some will answer "all were at fault."

This may be denied or admitted, yet the fact still remains that it is unfair and unjust to base the efficiency of the workman upon such an unreliable, impossible estimate.

Quite frequently the material to be used on a job is not in store and it is necessary to use material not figured on when the time was estimated. Now, although different material is used, the time allowed on the job remains unaltered.

Another illustration: Stick down loose spots in linoleum on West Virginia. Estimate, 1 man 2 days. This job took over 12 days to complete.

Joiners work in radio room, etc., on Burnside. Estimate, 1 man 2 days. This job took 1 man 9 days to complete.

Install altered hanger and fittings for storage of the new mess tables on Pittsburgh. Estimate, 1 man 3 days. This job took 2 men over 5 days.

Installing engines in two new 40-foot cutters the actual time consumed by the machinist in charge of the work was 33 days, making 16½ days for each launch. A part of this time was, of course, not used in actual work as a machinist, but was required in supervising the work of the boat builders who were installing foundations for engines, in lifting the engines out of the way and replacing them so as to get the proper fits upon the foundation timbers, and in instructing and supervising the installation of pipe work from boiler, etc.

When the job was done the management decided that there had been 8 days of lost time, or loafing, done by the machinist, and the estimate for future jobs of this kind was placed at 12½ days for each launch.

When that "next time" comes, how can the machinist make 100 per cent efficiency unless some one else does the supervising and he has other work placed conveniently so that he can take it up and work on it for short intervals and drop it again the instant he is able to proceed with the launch?

Pipe fitters had a job of setting coffee urns and installing bunks on U. S. S. Charleston.

Workman in charge of work told estimator that it would require 1 man 1 day on each job.

When job order was issued one-half day was allowed upon each; needless to say that an extension was required upon each.

The coffee urn was delivered at 11 a. m., thus permitting 1 hour to do what proved to be more than a full day's work. The job actually took 1½ days' time.

The following are cases of variation between estimated time and actual time:

J. O. No. 53P492/390 oper. 1.1, 1 man 2 hours; actual time, 35 minutes.

J. O. No. O–5803, oper. 9.6, 1 man 4 hours; actual time, one-half hour.

U. S. S. Milwaukee, fire control, tel. system; testing, tagging, and connecting. Estimate, 1 man 12 days; extended 6 days.

Milwaukee, T. D. salvo; est., 1 man 6 days, actual time, 1 man 12 days.

Burnside, radio station installation; est., 1 man 2 days; extended 5 days.

A painter was assigned the job of painting some pipes on the Milwaukee, his work having been previously "planned" for him, yet he did not have enough material nor enough time.

The estimate was evidently made upon the measured plan for surface work, but these pipes were close to other obstructions, and the man had to lay down on his back to reach some parts of the work.

Could he be honestly expected to get 100 per cent efficiency under these conditions?

In turning some 70-inch piston rings the estimated time was 6 hours each, and it actually took 16 hours each.

Remove bonnets, etc., for examination on valves in engine-room spaces on U. S. S. New Orleans—about 35 valves.

Estimated time, 33 days; actual time, 1½ days.

Estimate in fitting bearings of 6 rods on U. S. S. New Orleans, 2 men 4 days. Took 4 men 7½ days.

The New Orleans' main shaft was fitted after pistons, and all were in place, thus using up a great deal of the room and making it awkward to work, yet the time limit was insisted upon.

The following comparative example is given upon labor's work: A gang of four men were ordered to move a dough box in ship's galley. They were given four hours in which to move the box about 6 feet. The work was done in about 30 minutes. The next day the same men were ordered to sling six stagings around the stern of the ship, for which they were allowed 1 hour. Upon this staging other workmen were to risk their lives. This job took eight hours.

The master card feature, which seems necessary in conducting the individual record system, retards the work, for in the pursuance of our day's work we have been sent to do work of riveting in different parts of the ships, and in many cases there were as many as two and three different job orders for work in a certain vicinity where the whole could have been done up at the one time and by the one gang of riveters. On finishing certain parts of the work we were taken off and sent to other parts of the ship to work, and many times other riveters have been sent to the part of the ship we left to work on same work, only under different job orders. Had one job order been issued for a vicinity, work would have been completed by the first gang of riveters sent to that part of the ship. This would have saved two gangs moving at the same time. A riveter's outfit weighs about 500 pounds, and many times we are compelled to move same without good reason during a day, and nearly every move takes from one-half to one hour, and before the gangs are started again a good two hours have passed.

We are called upon many times to build our own working stage, and we have been asked to work without staging where it was unsafe for us to go. All of those delays count against our efficiency.

HOW IS INDIVIDUAL EFFICIENCY OBTAINED WHEN MEN ARE WORKING IN GANGS?

It is illustrated by a certain job of putting sheet-metal casing around engines. The estimate called for "four men, 8 days."

From the nature of the job two men were started to work on it and they worked for six days. Then two helpers were also put on the job to do rough work, such as holding dolly bar when rivets were driven, etc.

The whole job was completed in eight days, thus giving the first two men, who had done all of the skilled labor, just 100 per cent efficiency, while the two helpers received 400 per cent because the job was completed on time, and they worked one-fourth as long as the other men.

Did the clerk in charge of the individual records check this case and automatically correct it, or was it necessary for some one else to call it to his attention?

In another instance two electricians were assigned to assist an estimator in getting data on installation of a wireless set upon a certain ship. The estimate was extended from day to day upon this work, without any change being made upon the master cards which the workmen held, and when the job was finally completed these two men were recorded as having 22 per cent efficiency. Did the clerk in charge of individual records check this case and automatically correct it, or was it necessary for some one else to call it to his attention, and was not the efficiency record at once changed by the simple stroke of a pen from 22 per cent to 125 per cent?

In another instance of work upon installing tail shafts by machinists, this job took several days. One man finished his part of the work two days before the expiration of time allowed upon his master card, while the other men were not yet completed. An extension was granted of two days upon the entire job, and this man was assigned to the other work and had to continue charging his time upon this same master card. When the job was finished, of course he received 100 per cent, for which no doubt he should feel grateful; but how about his chance of high efficiency for having completed his task four days previously?

SCHEDULE BOARDS AS REGULATORS OF PROGRESS.

In the office of various trade divisions there are maintained more or less elaborate blackboards, and at the central dispatching office an entire building is practically given over to these blackboards.

They have a series of columns and lines, and the spaces thus made are filled from time to time by having written in them certain numerals, which are followed by grotesque lines pointing in various directions.

These fantastic characters doubtless have an intelligible meaning to those who understand them, but from the workman's standpoint it would require a Mr. Dooley to properly describe them.

We are told that these schedule boards show—with absolute certainty—just the number of men of each particular trade who can be efficiently worked upon any given job at any given time. These boards are filled out with schedules of work for weeks, and in some cases months, in advance.

You may say that this does not concern the workman, and we will therefore point out that it does concern him.

The first genuine joker which puts the "hed" in the "schedule" is the fact that they are originally made upon exactly the same estimates whose valuable character we have shown hereinbefore as being the basis upon which efficiency of individual workmen are established.

When the actual working time upon a job overruns the time shown upon the schedule board, is it to be supposed that the man in charge of the board, which is located at a distance from the work, can immediately determine whether the fault lies with the original estimate or with the progress of the work? If for any reason an extension has been granted upon some detail of the work, the board is corrected to meet this particular change, but our experience leads us to believe that additional changes are not made upon the subsequent details, which depend upon this first one, until such time as a collision has occurred by reason of the following steps being an impossibility.

The result being that the impressive blackboard, with its "showing of absolute certainty," is subject to continual erasure, substitutions, and corrections. The ultimate remedy for confusion and congestion of workmen into close quarters has certainly not yet been achieved, for a hasty job of repair work aboard ship causes a "madhouse" to-day, just as much as it ever did; and we are interested in the fact that our efficiency depends to some extent upon it.

Another joker in which we are interested is the fact that this same schedule board is supposed to show just how many men of a certain trade can be worked upon a certain date; and yet a vast proportion of the jobs that await repairs are not shown upon the board.

Owing to the great detail through which a job must pass before it reaches the schedule board a considerable amount of delay has accumulated.

We are certainly very much interested in the permanency of our employment, and it is an unquestioned fact that men have been discharged because the schedule board did not show any work ahead for them, and within a very few days new men would be employed, through the labor board, to take their places. Men have been furloughed for 10 days and called back in 2 days. Men engaged upon work aboard ship have been given furlough cards during the afternoon, to take effect at the close of the day's work, and before quitting time that same day additional work was placed upon the schedule board, and a hasty rushing about took place among the supervisors in an effort to have men taken from their work in the shop and transferred to this outside work and be in readiness to start the following morning. The outside men had to spend some time in turning their tools into various tool issuing rooms, and the inside men had to spend some time in getting together suitable kits for the outside work.

It is thus shown that the "absolute certainty" of the schedule board tells only a part of the story, and that our permanency of employment is made precarious on account of too much importance being placed upon it.

It leads to the inquiry as to whether the best effort should be expended in trying to have all progress conform to a chalk mark on a board, or whether this energy might be used in having work progress advantageously with regard to conditions as they exist, varying as conditions do from time to time, and let the chalk mark be of a secondary importance. These boards might be used to record progress as it actually takes place, but we doubt their value when used in the nature of prophets.

FUNCTIONAL MANAGEMENT ILLUSTRATED.

When pneumatic tools are in need of repairs they have to surmount the following hurdles in the race to be placed in good condition again. The following being the recital of an actual case upon a "rush" job, which is frequently repeated—

Function No. 1: The man in charge of tool-issuing room writes a request to have certain specified repairs made to the tool, identifying it by giving the shop number of the tool, and marks the request "rush."

Function No. 2: A messenger takes this piece of paper from shop M-2 to the office of the shop superintendent of machinery division M-1, which is across the street.

Function No. 3: The piece of paper then goes to a clerk, who typewrites duplicate copies and places it upon the desk of the master machinist.

Function No. 4: The master machinist initials the order, and places it upon the desk of the chief estimator.

Function No. 5: The chief estimator takes the order, and personally crosses the street from shop M-1 to shop M-2, examines the tool, and makes an estimate upon time required to repair it, and returns across the street from shop M-2 to shop M-1.

Function No. 6: A messenger then takes the duplicate papers from the office of the estimator of machinery division across the street to the office of the shop superintendent of hull division in the general office building.

Function No. 7: The shop superintendent of hull division initials one copy of the papers.

Function No. 8: A messenger then takes the duplicate papers from the office of the shop superintendent of hull division in the general office building, across the street, to the office of the shop superintendent of machinery division, in shop M-1, where it is given to the schedule clerk.

Function No. 9: The schedule clerk copies a synopsis of the order upon his schedule sheet and writes in the date that the job is to be commenced.

Function No. 10: A messenger then takes some of the copies of the order from the office in shop M-1 across the street to shop M-2—the building in which the original request was written three days previously—and leaves the order at the tool repair room. During those three days a messenger has made five trips upstairs to the repair room to see if the tool was finished, and work has not yet been started upon it.

Function No. 11: The man in charge of tool-repair room assigns the job, writes the name and rating of the operator on the face of the order, and places it in the proper receptacle at workman's bench.

Function No. 12: The operator repairs the tool, then takes his copy of the order and writes upon the back of it the date and actual time employed that day on the job.

Function No. 13: Once a day the timekeeper arrives; he copies a synopsis of the order upon a separate daily card bearing this operator's number; he also initials the date and hours which the operator had placed on the back of the order.

Function No. 14: The man in charge of the tool-repair room collects the order after the work has been completed—and the timekeeper initials it; he then fills in the face of the order with the "total time" and "date of completion," and attests it with his signature.

Function No. 15: A messenger then takes the copies of the order from the repair room in shop M-2 across the street to the office of the shop superintendent of machinery division in shop M-1, where it is given to the schedule clerk.

Function No. 16. The schedule clerk now marks "completed" upon his schedule sheets and hands the order over to the efficiency clerk.

Function No. 17. The efficiency clerk checks the "estimated time" with the "actual time" and marks the workman's record card.

The clerical or paper part of this "rush" repair job had now passed through 17 hands and has consumed more than four days of elapsed time, and yet if absolute safety were the object two important features have been overlooked. No receipt was given for the tool when it was delivered to tool-repair room and none was required when it was returned to the issuing room.

The actual time required to place the above tool in good repair was less than one hour.

How about the efficiency of the man who was waiting for this special tool, so that he could complete his work?

If additional repairs to the tool had been necessary, further delay would have occurred in getting an extension of time. And if the operator had used more than the estimated time it is probable that the paper would have started upon another excursion through various functions to ascertain the cause.

OVERHEAD CHARGES.

A small army of clerks, estimators, supervisors, and incidentals are considered necessary under this system, and the expense of measuring, assigning, classifying, supervising, and compiling records on any given job is so great that it practically equals that of the direct labor required in doing the actual work.

The job of painting the coaling plant may be taken as an illustration: Direct labor, $904; material, $780; overhead charges, $632.

This job was not finished for lack of funds. On this job, besides the foreman, there was an estimator, who spent his time in checking up the work performed by the men, and he was continually on the job for 37 days, at $4 per day.

Frequently there were only three or four helpers working on this job, and the work was practically all done by helpers at $2.56 per day.

In the shipfitting department they have a counting system that is used upon drillers' and riveters' work; that is, it is used when the man is at work. On two occasions this man went on furlough, and the counting system was forgotten till his return—then it went into service again.

The first furlough was for three weeks on account of sickness in his family, and the second was for two weeks, on annual leave, at the expiration of his year of service. The workmen in the above trades feel that if things got along all right for five weeks that they would continue to do permanently with this feature eliminated.

ARE THE RECORDS VALUABLE?

Nearly every efficiency engineer who has written a book upon the subject of scientific management has stated emphatically that there is no economy in keeping records for the sake of records only.

From the very nature of navy-yard work it is principally repairing or remodeling, and every job has its distinctive features, and these will give little or no data upon which to base future estimates, it having been estimated that less than 5 per cent of the job orders issued can by any reasonable process be considered as standard operations.

And from the same nature of the work it is highly probable that in the future these standard operations will be performed by different methods and in varying degrees of completeness and even having work done in entirely different machines.

It is further an absolute certainty that in future cases which have any emergency features about them a vast mass of nonessentials now contained in this recording system will be cast aside abruptly, else the completion of the important work will be seriously retarded.

The U. S. S. New Orleans is being repaired under the planning system after a careful analysis had been made. Before that work was completed the "careful analysis" had been so badly shot to pieces that it is now practically unrecognizable. Any number of orders were closed as being "completed" only to be reissued in a few days for additional work, and the original analysis is so plastered with extensions and extra operations as to resemble a patchwork quilt.

It may be possible that in due time a sufficiently large force of clerks could arrange some kind of a record from the papers which survive the chaos suggested above.

And when this record was finally set forth it would simply show the actual time and cost expended upon the job, plus the overhead charges necessary in making it. It would not in any manner show what the working conditions were; they are concealed in it.

In other words, the "fish" that make up efficiency would not be in evidence; neither would there be any proof that a large amount of work had been done, simply because a large amount of clerical work had been necessary in issuing minutely detailed job orders to cover it.

It is no argument to say that a certain ship has been completely overhauled a great deal cheaper than formerly, when perhaps the fact is that less than half the work has been done this time, and the quality of the present work may be inferior.

SPEED, OR SAFETY AND QUALITY.

It will be remembered that when the limited trains were established between New York and Chicago and an extra fare was charged to passengers for negotiating this distance in record time that a rebate was promised to the passenger in case the railroad failed to maintain the schedule.

After some accidents had occurred and others had narrowly been averted, the Government officials stepped in and said, "Speed alone is not the prime requisite; we must have safety first," and then the rebating feature was stopped. There is no doubt, however, that the various railroads endeavor to maintain their schedules without being forced to do so; but when it becomes a question as to safety, they will sacrifice a few minutes of the schedule and no one will gainsay but the general public is benefited by doing so.

Whenever the Government makes contracts for equipment the contract always contains the clause, "Material and workmanship to be of the best quality."

The individual record of efficiency is based upon time or speed alone.

A good job upon which a low estimate has been placed will be shirked in an effort to come through on time.

The efficiency list places every workman in direct competition with all his fellow workmen in holding his job.

Quality of workmanship has been entirely forgotten and only quantity is considered in the mad struggle for position on the efficiency list.

The system is productive of quantity at the expense of quality.

Men driven under this system lose all interest in their work to the extent that when working where the measured system can not be employed the work suffers both in quality and quantity.

The system spurs men to accomplish more work than they are able to maintain, and consequently they must produce poorer work.

A good workman takes a pride in his work, and when he is speeded up so that he must shirk it robs him of the little pleasure that he should have in what he has produced.

While at our work we wonder if we are to be displaced by some fellow who has less regard for good workmanship, and we inwardly resolve to prevent this by turning out a greater quantity, at the expense of quality. If in the future ships are damaged through the faulty installation of their apparatus, such damages should not be attributed to the workman but to the system that requires nothing but low labor cost.

This system may have advantages in the handling of pig iron or digging of ditches, but when the safety of many lives, millions of dollars in real property, and possibly the honor of our Nation depend upon the highest quality of workmanship that can be produced we deem it folly for the Government to perpetuate a system by which quality is overthrown to produce quantity.

This system might recommend itself to one who manufactures to sell his produce, but where the wear, preservation, and quality are desired, and when one builds for self-protection, it is a failure. Since this system has been established quality has not been questioned.

WHAT IS THE INEVITABLE RESULT?

We quote a very able writer in saying, "We all know that teamwork wins in baseball; that a lot of stars playing each for his own record will be beaten by players of less individual skill who pull together. Yet in commercial and industrial life we are slow to learn this lesson. A factory will never be efficient wherein a large part of the workmen are looking for another job, whether because of pay or conditions or tools or management."

Industrial unrest has taken place in some eastern navy yards to the extent of cessation of work, and relief was only reached by modifying certain features of the management.

Under the present system all cooperation between the workmen has been killed and buried. The one idea is to keep ahead of all others on the efficiency list. One of the ways employed in doing this is to refuse to lend aid to one another.

Harmony has been displaced by discord. Every man feels as though all others were his enemies. Jealousy, greed, craftiness, and stealth are some of the undesirable traits being rapidly developed among us.

The system breeds dissension, jealousy, and hatred among the men.

A recent inquiry was made of a great number of individual workmen in this navy yard by a naval officer in an effort to learn their views upon the system, and if he found any who were even reasonably satisfied with the system we have yet to learn of it.

Is it not a fair question to ask, Is an industrial plant efficiently managed when practically the entire force of supervisors and workmen are dissatisfied?

Any fair-minded man will concede that master workmen welcome methods which will assist them in their duties.

We believe that if all master workmen were called together and asked the direct question, "Does the individual record of efficiency, as now kept, assist you at all in determining who are the most efficient workmen?" that the unanimous answer would be "No."

Asked, "Is it not simply additional clerical work, without any benefit whatever, in rating men?" they would answer "Yes."

The supervisor knows, or ought to know, who are his best men without a clerk coming from the office to tell him.

Assuming that most supervisors and men are honest, why continue this daily persecution of efficiency record upon men who do not deserve punishment?

We also believe that at present warnings of discontent among the men may be mentioned by the master workmen or minor supervisors, and that these warnings go unheeded, while perhaps a management with greater experience in industrial matters would pause and engage in careful introspect.

DO THE BEST WORKMEN HAVE THE HIGHEST EFFICIENCY?

It is usually the case that the best workmen have the lowest efficiency record. There are various causes for this strange fact. The poorest mechanic, incompetent to judge or even know when he is doing poor work, rushes through his task, generally completing before a more careful workman, and thus procuring a high rating in his percentage.

Again, the foreman, in order to keep the efficiency of his department as high as possible, must give the most difficult tasks—that is, the jobs with the least amount of comparative time allowed—to the best workmen, the easier tasks being given to the poorer workmen.

The good workman is jollied along and told to do the best he can under the circumstances, and he goes at the task knowing that he is facing the certainty of a low efficiency.

Another cause of low efficiency of the best workmen is due to the fact that they are given long, involved jobs requiring from a few days up to 30 days to complete, while the poorer workmen are given the short jobs requiring but a brief time to complete.

A man may be given a job upon which insufficient information has been supplied, and he has some delay in securing the necessary data. The estimator did not figure on this fact, yet the man's time in which to do the work is limited, and perhaps he finds after working a week on the job he has overrun the time allowed, and his efficiency has depreciated.

In the meantime another man is given a number of short jobs, coming out on time—since they are easier to estimate—and yet this last man perhaps is not as good a mechanic, or some one else had to get all the data for him. The estimator can not allow less than one hour on a single operation; consequently the real short jobs have more time allowed than is necessary, and the workman given these short tasks can run his efficiency away up as compared with the better man. The records and even casual observation will bear out this. Under this system it is possible for one man to get a large portion of jobs with lots of time, while another man may be a better all-round man; yet because he gets jobs with short time upon them he makes a lower percentage upon his product.

If the efficiency record is utilized as showing who is most efficient, and a reduction of the force is to take place, it will be seen that in the above cases the best men would go first.

As a rule, the first-class workman has given up a good job elsewhere, believing he will have steady work at the navy yard, but instead he is in constant dread of a low marking under this system, and is consequently expecting a loss of his job. There are helpers, or handy men, employed on machines molding small castings. These men have no previous practical experience as molders, nor have they served any apprenticeship to the trade. The natural consequence is that a large per cent of their work results in defective and inferior castings.

Under this efficiency or deficiency system, when a slackness of work occurs, these men are put to work on molding plain jobs on the floor, and the time of the foreman or leading man might be more profitably employed looking after their legitimate business in the shop than in teaching these men the trade.

IN CONNECTION WITH COL. MULHALL'S TESTIMONY BEFORE THE SENATE.

We are not unmindful of the fact that the individual records may not be used in good faith, but after the Government has been to great expense in compiling data, copies may be—and perhaps already are—furnished to private manufacturers' associations, thus establishing the worst form of blacklist, the employer thus having a pretended true Government record of the workman, which the man is powerless to refute, since he is not at any time informed as to his standing.

It is useless to establish a system of informing men of their standing, for they already know that the basis is unreliable, and it would only lead to quarreling, discontent, demoralization of the working force through charges of favoritism, etc.

DOES PERPETUAL MOTION REQUIRE FURTHER IMPROVEMENT?

We have heard that some ardent advocates of efficiency systems (under which their own efficiency is not recorded) claim that the system is "all right, but of course it needs a little improvement to adapt it to our needs."

It is perhaps strange, but from time immemorial those who claim that perpetual motion is feasible have advanced similar views. No matter how dismal the failure they have met, their hope mounted up, and they presented to the world a plausible story to the effect that only a little additional improvement was needed.

During the past few years we have seen the arrival and departure of various features of momentary importance which were attached to the system.

The word "scientific" was quickly dropped and the name "improved" adopted in its place.

Where are the speed charts, cut meters, tabulated list of capacity of machines, slide rules, stop watch, etc., of yesterday?

Have they all been discarded so that the present individual record of efficiency might have full sway?

The offensive character of the stop watch was demonstrated and its use abolished, with the statement that hereafter such features would only be used with the consent of the governed.

It reminds us of the story of the business man who was seeking a manager for his establishment, and since he believed in advertising he took that course in looking for a man, and as a result he had a large number of applicants.

After a careful examination of them all he recalled the one man whose record, previous business associations, and knowledge of the trade marked him as being head and shoulders above all other applicants.

During the further conversation the owner carefully noted the bloated form and flushed face which he had overlooked at the first interview, and having some doubt in his mind he asked the question, "My friend, are you a drinking man?" The applicant promptly replied, "No, sir; I used to drink some, but I stopped." The owner then ventured the following question, "When did you stop, and for how long?"

The workmen at this navy yard wonder whether the individual-record system was adopted without any misgivings as to its future and for how long it must be endured.

IS THE EFFICIENCY RECORD OBNOXIOUS?

We have suffered considerable agony for several months on account of this efficiency record, and this committee is in receipt of a letter from the commandant, which contains the following:

"The records for outside workmen based upon estimates have not been used for rating or discharge of men, as it has not been running a sufficient length of time and has not been perfected, consequently, as no use has been made of it as yet, it can not be obnoxious."

In this connection we wish to say that this committee has made no criticism of the local management. We fully realize that the fault which we object to is inherent to the system and does not depend upon the personnel of those who enforce it.

We wish to say to the Secretary of the Navy, who alone has the authority to grant this relief, and to say it with all the earnestness of which we are capable, that the individual-record feature as it is based upon time estimates is very obnoxious to the navy-yard workmen, and we sincerely pray that he will abolish this feature at the earliest possible moment.

We are perfectly willing to be rated by the management upon any fair basis, and this can be done and has been done for years without any such system as the present one.

DANGER FROM LEAD POISONING.

The work of removing old paint and rust from the metal work aboard ships is done by laborers and is accomplished with chisels used in pneumatic hammers and is known under the general term of "scaling." It is probably the most disagreeable and unhealthy work in the navy yard, and often it is the most dangerous owing to the difficulty of getting suitable standing room from which to work. The scalers are exposed to the danger of lead poisoning at all times while engaged in removing paint, and in removing rust their lungs become quickly filled with dust. Owing to the proven unhealthy character of the work the Navy Department has issued orders from time to time that no person should be permitted to engage in this class of labor for a longer period than four weeks without then having an intermission of a considerable period at other work free from the dangers attached to the above.

This rule is no longer effective at this navy yard. Let me tell you of the reward that a good scaler gets for working hard. He is spotted as a good man for the job and is kept at it until he goes to the hospital or refuses to scale longer, in which case he is disrated or discharged.

One man was disrated without apparent cause in May of this year, but continued to scale until, in early June, he went to the hospital, where he died in a few days of pneumonia. His lungs were so affected that he was unable to combat the disease, and his shift was short.

We are compelled to scale the sides of ships, standing on swinging staging 30 feet or more above the floor of the dry dock, and men who are unable to scale because of the dust or who become dizzy in this dangerous position and are unable to do the work are disrated or discharged. Owing to the extra danger from lead poisoning in certain localities that do not have ample ventilation, 24 cents per day extra is paid for scaling in inclosed places—that is, below the gun deck and not under an open hatch. For this extra 3 cents per hour somebody must volunteer or be drafted to go into these places and shake hands with death. This work upon the U. S. S. New Orleans was done by enlisted men, who are presumed to be in perfect health, and the records will show that 11 of them were sent to the hospital suffering from lead poisoning on this job alone.

Again we call attention to the fact that the four weeks' limit is no longer observed with laborers upon scaling jobs at this yard.

BROKEN WORKDAY.

In some instances men are compelled to work from 8 a. m. until 12 m. and are then sent home with orders to report at 6 p. m. and work till 10 p. m. In other cases laborers commence work at 4 or 5 a. m., work three hours and are then sent home till 1 p. m., they then work till 4 p. m., and are again sent home till 7 p. m., and finish their day's work at 9 p. m.

The day is completely broken up and the evening is spoiled, and they receive only regular pay for eight hours' work. Sometimes we work a full day and are then called in at midnight to work till 8 a. m., thus working 16 hours out of 24, with no overtime pay. In other cases we work eight hours straight without time to eat. It may be said that this applies particularly in docking ships, when it is necessary to take advantage of the tide, and that no considerable number of workmen are involved, but we do not see that this fact removes any responsibility from paying a suitable recompense for it. This feature is not confined to work upon Government ships, but applies to all workmen who are on the yard pay roll, even when the work is done for merchant ships which are placed in the dry dock at this yard.

A particular instance is given in the case of the ship County of Linlithgow, a tramp merchantman flying the Chilean flag, which docked at this yard some time ago.

A claim was made that private dry docks in this vicinity were rushed for a considerable period in the future, and special permission was granted by the Navy Department to dock this ship at the navy yard. She was not injured, was not in a sinking condition, and could have been towed to San Francisco if necessary, although there are suitable private docks at cities nearer. It was necessary to undock a Government ship to provide room for her. The contractor brought some workmen from Seattle daily, but had trouble in getting men, owing to the fact that a strike was in effect at his Seattle shops—which perhaps was the controlling reason for docking this ship at the navy yard at all.

The contractor was very anxious to rush the repairs and get the ship in service in as short an elapsed time as possible, and he offered attractive inducements of overtime pay to various yard employees if they could be placed upon his own pay roll.

Some of these workmen asked yard officials for permission to make the above arrangements, and it was denied them. The contractor then requested that certain repairs might be made by yard labor, and it was granted.

The workmen were then compelled—and in some instances against their emphatic protest—to do this work under an improvised system of lap shifts and broken hours, working a few hours and being sent home to come back later and finish their day. They worked during all kinds of hours, at night as well as day, and did not receive one cent of extra compensation above their regular daily wage.

During the past few months there has been a regular night shift maintained in the machine shops upon work in remodeling projectiles, and they are paid nothing extra for working at night.

Upon Friday night they work straight through from 4 p. m. till 4 a. m. Saturday morning, making a 12-hours' shift at night, and without extra pay.

We request that 25 per cent extra pay be granted for every hour worked outside of the regular schedule for daywork.

WORK BY ENLISTED MEN AND MILITARY PRISONERS.

The painters and laborers particularly protest against their being thrown out of employment due to being displaced by enlisted men and military prisoners. A clause was adopted in the naval appropriation bill signed August 22, 1912, which aimed to restrict this practice, but it is still unsatisfactory. Upon the U. S. S. New Orleans the ship's crew scaled and painted the entire outside of the ship. The following jobs have been painted by prison labor while civilian workmen were being discharged for "lack of work":

The old administration building, now used as an office and clubhouse for the receiving ship.

Other smaller buildings in that vicinity.

The disciplinary barracks.

The fence inclosing same and grounds.

The commanding officer's quarters of said barracks.

The athletic quarters and minor buildings.

For several months prisoners have been employed in grading about the new dry dock, which work would have served nicely in giving laborers the intermission, in the open air, which is considered necessary if the four weeks' limit is observed on scaling jobs.

The standard of living for an enlisted man is set by the Navy Department and his pay is not in accordance with the prevailing scale of wages in the yard where he works.

The civilian has many obligations to fulfill as a citizen and head of a family that are not required by enlisted men, and we consider that this is unfair competition.

THE RATING OF PAINTER'S HELPERS.

The painters ask that the rating of painter's helpers be abolished and that all painting work be done by skilled mechanics, claiming that the proportion of helpers is far too great as compared to the skilled mechanics employed.

The painter's helpers also request that this rating be abolished and submit the following reasons:

A helper in other departments of labor in this navy yard is one who works with and is an assistant to a mechanical laborer, helping him in the execution of his duties. But in the painting department the helper is not an assistant to a craftsman. There is no distinction between the duties of a painter's helper and those of a painter. Their work is synonymous, the helper bearing the same responsibility in the execution of his work that the painter bears in doing his. Each one works independently of the other. Not only are his duties the same as those of the painter, but in the standards of speed and efficiency the average of the painters' helpers is parallel with the average of the painters.

Notwithstanding these facts, we are working under the guise of the efficiency labor system. If we are efficiently doing the work of painters, and our records prove that we have been doing so, why are we not paid painters' wages instead of the low standard of common labor—$2.56 per day? There is an unbroken precedent in this navy yard that, notwithstanding how efficient a painter's helper may prove himself to be in the course of his employment, he must work at least two, and in the majority of cases, three years as a painter, not as a helper, at the wages of a common laborer before he is permitted to receive the distinction of even a fourth-class painter. We are entitled to the wages of painters with the opportunity of promotion in comparison with our efficiency.

We are told by the chief construction officer that we are "allowed" to do painter's work rather than to "lay us off," because there is no painter's helpers work for us to do. At the same time, more painter's helpers were hired. If there were no painter's helpers work to be done, why were we not hired and paid as painters? It is evident that painter's helpers are hired, not as cheap laborers, but as a means to get labor done cheaply.

Not for lack of efficiency, not speed, are they paid only $2.56 per day, but because those of authority say: "We will call him, not a painter, but a painter's helper," thus getting the same result for $2.56 that otherwise would cost $4.

A few months ago the machines in the S. E. machine shop were to be painted and varnished. This work was given to a first-class painter. Soon the fact was rumored that the job was costing too much; that the yard was short of money. The first-class painter at $4 per day was removed from the work and the job was given to a painter's helper, who was obliged to finish the work at $2.56 per day. Two conclusions can be drawn from this incident, viz: The painter's helper was qualified to do the work or he would not have been given it to do. Second, he was given the work because his seven or eight weeks on the job meant a saving of $1.44 per day to the management of the yard.

Further information for proof of our claim that we are entitled to painter's wages, with increase in proportion to efficiency, can be found on further investigation.

SATURDAY HALF HOLIDAY FOR POWER-PLANT EMPLOYEES.

Can not something be done to give the employees of the central power plant equal rights with other employees of the yard to the Saturday afternoon holidays during July, August, and September?

The other employees of the yard get Saturday afternoon holiday with pay, while the men of the power plant work continuously the eight hours' shift without holiday or extra pay.

Now, we consider that we need the rest and recreation as much or more than the other employees.

HELPERS TOO SCARCE IN SHIP FITTERS' DIVISION.

On account of the economy practiced under the present system riveters have to work in grease and water on tank tops and in water bottoms. We are often sent to work in water bottoms before being pumped dry and cleaned out; also sent to work on dirty, greasy tank tops before grease has been cleaned up.

We are also sent to work where new holes have been drilled and the old paint left on; the result is that when we drive a rivet the dry paint flies like a shot out of a gun. This causes extreme pain and also is the cause of us having to be absent from our work on account of sore eyes, which is a loss to us. This could be avoided by having scalers remove the paint around holes that must be riveted, and by so doing the work would be better done when the job was completed.

The drillers use powerful air tools, in places difficult of access. It is not the custom in this trade to be furnished with a helper except in very rare cases. This jeopardizes the workmen in getting out the record number of holes while working in bad places. It should be less difficult to secure assistance of a helper for short periods.

LABORERS DOING HELPERS' WORK AT SMALL PAY.

The laborers are frequently assigned to do helpers' work with ship fitters, pipe fitters, riggers, molders, and others, but receive only laborers' pay.

A large part of the rigging is done by common laborers, there being but a few men rated as riggers' helpers.

In some instances the boss of a gang is only a laborer in charge, receiving a laborer's pay, as do the men working under him.

We understand that Navy Regulations provide that no workman can be kept at work in advance of his rating for any considerable time except in cases of emergency without his receiving additional pay for the work that he is doing.

BULLETIN BOARDS.

A short time ago we read in the newspapers what purported to be a communication under date of July 15, 1913.

From: Acting Secretary of the Navy.

To: Chief of bureaus and officers; commandants, navy yards and stations; officers in charge of Navy pay offices; United States superintending naval constructors; United States inspectors of machinery, etc.

Subject: Increase in pay and force.

It contained matter relative to the general questions of the readjustment of the pay of the employees at all navy yards, stations, etc., and closed with the following instructions: "Copies of this letter will be posted in conspicuous places for the information of officers and employees."

We were extremely glad to note the above communication, since it would appear that the Navy Department had adopted a definite policy of direct communication with the employees upon matters of special interest to them and would use official bulletin boards in doing so. The frank statement that while the requests from the employees had not been refused, yet they were held in abeyance for further investigation, was certainly an item of live interest to the employees, and we have awaited its appearance upon the bulletin boards so as to learn the full contents of the communication.

After two weeks' time, we are unable to learn that it has been officially posted in any conspicuous place at this navy yard.

It may also be said that this committee, in replying to an invitation from the commandant for a meeting in which the efficiency system might be elucidated to the committee, have made a request that instead of a meeting being held the complete details of the Navy Department system of improved management, which apply specially to the individual workmen at this navy yard, may be conspicuously posted upon an official bulletin board. We believe that this method will be far more satisfactory since no one will be compelled to depend upon hearsay from others.

There is another matter that we also believe should be posted upon bulletin boards. It has always been understood that a workman was granted 15 days' annual leave with pay and 15 days' leave without pay during the year upon proper request being made.

To the best of our knowledge it has never been the custom heretofore to deduct any of the leave with pay on account of the workman having utilized some part of the 15 days permitted without pay.

If he were simply absent without leave that is a different proposition, but where he had made a proper request so that the management was informed of the desired leave and could make necessary arrangements, and the absence of the workman would not interfere with the work at hand, the leave has been granted and no deduction was made from the annual 15 days' leave with pay.

During the past year, however, some sort of change seems to have been made in this respect, and deductions are made from the leave with pay for each day of absence, no matter how few they may have been, and regardless of whether it was due to unauthorized absence or was leave that had been granted without pay.

There is, therefore, no longer any inducement in this respect for a workman to notify the management when he desires to be absent for brief periods.

We fully believe that when changes are made in matters of this kind which can affect all workmen in the navy yard a proper notice should be conspicuously posted upon authorized bulletin boards.

WAGES.

It has been said that you can tell a man that there are 270,169,325,481 stars and he will believe you; but if a sign says "Fresh paint" he has to make a personal investigation.

The matter of wages is one upon which the various trades have made repeated and extended investigation, and have duly submitted the results to wage boards for consideration.

It is hardly necessary to say that in some instances, at least, the ultimate result of such consideration has not been satisfactory to the workmen interested. In the case of the machinists, they have protested to the Navy Department against the recommendations made by the wage board for the year 1913, and that protest is still pending.

It may be said that they experienced a great deal of difficulty in having their protest considered, since the acting commandant of this navy yard refused to forward it to the department in the form which it had been prepared.

The feature which was objected to was simply a recital of the machinists' belief that outside influence had been used with members of the wage board in giving them misinformation, and in effect the story was along similar lines to the testimony now being given to Congress in amplified form by Col. Mulhall.

Inasmuch as the machinists' protest relative to wages for 1913 is still pending at the Navy Department, these workmen feel quite interested in having posted the communication from the department under date of July 15, 1913, which is mentioned elsewhere. They also desire to make inquiry if workmen can reasonably be expected to supinely wait an entire year for a new wage board to convene in a case like the above, where refusal was made by local officers to forward their protest, and were they not justified in forwarding the protest in its original form direct to the department?

The electricians wish to refer the Secretary of the Navy to eleven affidavits now on the files of the wage board and which were submitted to that board last December. These affidavits show that on the wiring of the new marine officers' quarters, the marine barracks, the foundry, and the general storehouse by contract at this yard the minimum wage paid journeymen wiremen was $5 per day and boat fare to and from Seattle. The minimum wage paid for helpers was $3.50 per day and boat fare to and from Seattle. That the wages paid for work done on the floating crane varied from $5 to $6.50 per day. Also, that the prevailing wages paid in Seattle, Tacoma, and vicinity are $5 per day for journeymen and $3.50 per day for helpers. The attention of the Secretary is called to the fact that the only firms not paying this scale are the Heffernan Dry Dock Co. and the Seattle Dry Dock & Construction Co., and that these two firms do but a small part of the electrical work done in this vicinity.

The boilermakers, ship fitters, sheet-metal workers, pipe fitters, and many other trades claim that the wages paid at this navy yard do not conform to those paid in the vicinity by private firms, and they desire that the entire subject of wages may be reopened here with the purpose of ascertaining the exact facts. The wages paid to laborers are inadequate to properly support a family.

In the city of Seattle a minimum rate of $2.75 per day has been established for common laborers, and the men here request that this be made the minimum at this navy yard. They further request that while doing scaling work they be paid 40 cents per hour and that they be not required to scale for more than two weeks without a change to other work.

The machinists helpers ask that in justice to themselves and to those who receive less wages than they do that a minimum wage be established at this navy yard of not less than $2.75 per day to all adult workmen. They further ask that they be assured that after two years' service their rate will be made at least midway between this minimum and that paid to fourth-class mechanics. Objection is also urged against the practice of employing persons classed as "boys" to do helper's work at boy's pay. The sailmakers approve of installing machines to facilitate work. The men employed upon them have done everything possible in advancing ideas toward the end of perfecting the machines to suit the work at hand, and a number of valuable ideas which were thus advanced are now profitably employed at this yard. They believe that the skilled mechanical work of their line, done either by hand or upon machines, should be performed by craftsmen, and they object to being displaced by women unless the women are paid equally high wages.

LABOR MARKET.

This navy yard is located at no great distance from cities whose population aggregates more than half a million people, and that population is made up for the greater part of working people. These cities contain various shipbuilding plants of respectable magnitude, as well as terminal shops for several of the great continental railroads, which together employ a great number of men in the trades which are required at a navy yard. This committee feels able to say without fear of successful contradiction that the labor market is of ample proportions to fully supply the needs at this yard. We are fully aware that in the recent past a number of riveters and chippers and calkers were transferred at considerable expense from the Mare Island Navy Yard to do work here.

We wish to express the opinion that the apparent necessity for this was not due to any inadequacy of the local labor market, but was due to the fact that capable men in those trades residing in this vicinity did not seek employment here on account of dissatisfaction with the wages and working conditions offered them at this yard. After being transferred here the men from Mare Island Navy Yard were paid wages in excess of that paid to the local men who worked beside them. In the past a scarcity of registrations from boiler makers have existed from similar reasons.

At the present time the labor employment board is advertising in the newspapers for common laborers. It is ridiculous to assume that the market is too closely limited and it were better to state the reasons as due to wages, working conditions, system of registration, and lack of steady employment.

CIVILIAN REPRESENTATION ON WAGE BOARD.

We believe that the workmen at navy yards should have equal representation with the naval officers upon the annual wage board. We feel that the civilian members of the wage board should be selected by the workmen, either from navy-yard employees or elsewhere, as they desire, provided that their choice, if made from outside of Government employees, be persons of standing and in possession of knowledge of the subject at hand. Such men, for instance, as the State commissioner of labor, or others of known ability, and agreeable to the naval officers.

SEVERE DISCIPLINE, OR REWARD FOR FAITHFUL SERVICE.

It has recently been noted that the Secretary of the Navy has given his approval to a bill introduced in Congress authorizing him to pay cash rewards to civilian employees who make valuable suggestions for improvements in manufacturing plants or processes.

As matters for comparison between actual facts as opposed to the theory of reward to faithful employees, as suggested above, the following incidents are presented as of recent occurrence at this navy yard:

A leading-man machinist in machine shop No. 1 at this yard was given the job of machining two tube sheets for the main condenser on the U. S. S. New Orleans. He assigned a driller, first class, to drilling one of the sheets, and made application to the master machinist for a man to work upon the other sheet.

A machinist, fourth class, was taken from his work in machine shop No. 2 and sent to this leading man, to be worked upon this second tube sheet. This machinist, fourth class, had previously had two years' experience upon similar work in shop 1 and was well known to the leading man, and was considered fully competent to do this work. He was assigned to a drill press within arm's reach of a similar machine, on which the sister tube sheet was being drilled and upon which the progress of a day's work had already been done.

The work was already plainly laid out, and the spaces to be left blank were marked with black shellac. The leading man gave full and detailed instructions to the workman as to the jig and tools required and how to proceed with the work. While the workman was getting tools, etc., from the tool-issuing room and was starting the job, the leading man was busily engaged elsewhere.

Upon the return of the leading man he examined the work and found that the man had placed the jig one-half inch off center and had already drilled a number of holes.

The leading man immediately reported the error to the shop superintendent, and upon investigation it was found that no damage had been done, and that no time had been lost on the job, as the holes could be used by drilling one end of the sister sheet to duplicate this one.

Further inquiry showed that the driller who was working upon the sister sheet had warned this workman that he was placing the jig different from what he had done in starting his job.

Whether the machinist—fourth class—was influenced by the psychology contained in the individual record of efficiency, and thought that the driller was simply trying to delay him, or not, will probably never be known; but during the investigation he told the master machinist that in placing the jig he had used his own judgment.

The shop superintendent held the leading man responsible, charged him with carelessness, and suspended him for six days without pay. The leading man then took an appeal to the Engineer officer, and pleaded not guilty to the charge of carelessness.

The Engineer officer stated that the tube sheets were shipped from the East; that they were expensive and difficult to obtain; and he decided that the leading man had shown an error in judgment in failing to see that this job was started right, even were it necessary to neglect other jobs in doing so; but he reduced the penalty to three days' suspension, and stated that the management proposed to fix responsibility and require penalty for all mishaps.

The leading man, who has given a number of years of faithful service to the Government at this navy yard, and who has from time to time devised many improvements of great value in getting out the work, and who has only recently devised and completed a fixture for slotting condenser ferrules which multiplies the product for this operation manyfold, took a further appeal to the commandant.

The commandant sustained the penalty of three days' suspension, in the interests of discipline, but told the leading man that he ought not to take the matter too seriously. The leading man replied that it was not the three days' suspension which he considered at all, but that, after these years of faithful service and the efforts which he had put forth at all times to promote the Government's interests, he felt that it was an injustice, under conditions such as were shown in the present case, to place upon his record a mark showing that he was suspended for carelessness or an error of judgment.

As another instance of reward for faithful service, we desire to point out the case of another leading-man machinist, in shop M–1, who was placed in charge of the work of remodeling a lot of projectiles.

This work had been started and had reached an unsatisfactory stage, coupled with a badly demoralized working force. When it was suggested that this work be transferred to this particular leading man he demurred, and frankly stated that he did not want to tackle the proposition unless he could be given free rein to make such changes as he thought necessary, and be permitted to conduct the job as he found best.

He was assured that he was considered fully competent to handle this job, and the authority was given him to conduct it to the best advantage.

He quickly systematized the work, restored confidence—and to some degree contentment—among the workmen, and the output rapidly improved both in quantity and quality. As the work developed and obstacles were met at the various stages, they were quietly but successfully overcome.

He planned and developed a number of valuable methods and accessories for advancing the work. It was found that the most troublesome operation was that of grinding certain spots to render suitable contact for set screws on the nose of the hardened projectile.

He advanced the idea of making turbine air motors to drive the grinder spindles, and in the face of considerable skepticism and opposition was granted permission to build a motor and try it out. It produced such excellent results that two additional motors were promptly built, and a large saving in the cost of this operation has folowed. He then devised a different scheme of attaching the soft cap to the projectile, which would entirely avoid the necessity of grinding these spots at all. This scheme was thoroughly tested out and was found to give fully as satisfactory results, and was very much cheaper and less troublesome to manufacture. This method was approved by the Navy Department, and authority was given to fit up a larger number of projectiles.

The necessary material was drawn from store, and the tools were ordered made, when suddenly, without explanation, and with only a few hours' notice, this leading man was shunted off from the shell job entirely, and told to report to the estimating section for the future.

He asked those in authority for an explanation, and was not given a satisfactory one.

He was thus left in a frame of mind where the predominant idea was that some one did not desire his services any longer and yet would not tell him so; and he was fully conscious that he had committed no fault. It was only upon the advice of friends of long standing from the supervisory force that he did not throw up the whole job at once.

We call attention to the conclusions and recommendations which were made last year by the congressional committee which investigated the Taylor and other systems of shop management, and quote from the fourth item:

"The management should put forth every effort to invite and induce full cooperation between the working force and themselves, and should, therefore, deal with the working force in the most open, frank, and candid way, affording the fullest opportunity for consultation and explanation in advance of proposed action affecting the interests of the workmen."

It would appear that these features were overlooked in both of the cases cited, and a large number of the quartermen and leading men at the Puget Sound Navy Yard have stated that they are undecided whether they can conscientiously recommend to the workmen a system which with pleasant words proposes a square deal and possible reward for faithful service, unless that theory be borne out by deeds.

F. A. SMITH,
Secretary of Committee.

Now, what do my colleagues suppose the great, big-hearted Secretary did with this statement so carefully drawn at expense of so much time and some money, all with the hope of reaching the Secretary direct? Well, it was automatically referred to Capt. Bryan and by him referred to Admiral Cottman, the commandant of the Puget Sound yard.

What did Admiral Cottman do? He called Mr. Smith, the secretary of the committee, before him and, in the parlance of the workmen, told him he and his committee could "go to ——." There were only two witnesses besides the admiral and Mr. Smith, both of these were commissioned officers. Here is what the admiral says he said to the workman, who must have gotten a little apprehensive as to his job by this time:

Some of the statements are not true and others did not state all of the facts, and they are not made with the idea of assisting the management in making improvements, but were an unfair and unjust criticism—knocking.

The above are results and absolutely the only results the committee ever received. No other answer was ever made. The Secretary never even acknowledged receipt of the grievances. The whole action was inspired and controlled by the officers' suggestions. Of course Secretary Daniels was very busy. We all know the limitations on his time, but most naturally the workmen felt peeved. Weeks and months passed. They took the matter up with me and I wrote the Secretary of the Navy on March 10, 1914, and asked for some reply to the workmen, and here is the Secretary's letter, which, of course, he did not prepare. The last sentence, however, reveals what a pitiable disappointment the workmen suffered. And it also shows a disregard of the rights of men that ought not to be possible in this Republic. Of course Admiral Cottman should have reported back to Washington—as he really did do—and then the Secretary should have written these men a letter, but—further action of this document was considered unnecessary—

after the commandant had called into his presence, and that of two naval officers as witnesses, the secretary of the committee and informed him that he and his associates were mere disturbers and knockers, and that they might "go to ——."

The Secretary's letter follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 13, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. BRYAN: The receipt of your letter of March 10 concerning a statement handed to me by a committee of workmen of the Puget Sound Navy Yard is hereby acknowledged.

In reply, I would say that the statement referred to contained a number of complaints or illustrations of what were considered unjust conditions or hardships in the case of certain employees. Many of the subjects treated of in the statement were of a general nature which admitted of no direct reply, and others were seemingly complaints of dissatisfied individuals. The statement was referred to the commandant of the yard, who carefully investigated every item thereof and reported that he was taking steps to ascertain defects in the management that could be eliminated, and that he had interviewed the secretary of the committee and had informed him that—

"Some of the statements were not true, and others did not state all of the facts, and that they were not made with the idea of assisting the management in making improvements, but were an unfair and unjust criticism—knocking—whereupon the secretary of the committee stated that he did not know of the facts cited of his own personal knowledge; that a lot of stuff was brought him and he just put it in."

In view of the facts, further action on this document by the department was not considered necessary.

Very truly, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

It is true the report of the admiral indicates that Mr. Smith made a rather disparaging remark of the work he had done. I do not know just exactly what Mr. Smith said, but I venture the suggestion that he did not say what he felt inclined to say, nor what he would have said had he been in a position of independence. The statement of the admiral certainly was a "knock," and there is nothing in the entire statement of the workmen that compares with it in plain, unpolished knocking.

I will say, however, that since this last letter was written I have again taken the matter up with the Navy Department, and I hope the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Roosevelt, has taken some of the matters up with the men at Bremerton in the last few days. He is out there, and I requested him to do this. I think Secretary Daniels had no intention of slighting the men; he simply signed the letters that were prepared by the officers.

There is a quarterman ship fitter out there at the Puget Sound yard named Ed. McKay. He was one of the parties who was very anxious to have these complaints investigated. He took local interest in the matter. It will be observed that one of the jobs which were cited in the complaint as instancing a complete breakdown of yard methods was the Burnside job. Details were set forth and a good case against inefficiency of the overhead estimators and the lameness of the estimates and stop-watch system was completely exposed. The men would have scored heavily in this case had their complaint been considered. The revelations were enough to convince anyone.

On February 26, 1914, just as they were urging me to bring the matter again to the attention of the department here, so as to get their complaint considered and some answers mailed out to Smith and others who were interested, charges of incompetency were filed against McKay, as follows:

NAVY YARD,
Puget Sound, Wash., February 26, 1914.

From: Construction officer.
To: Quarterman Ship Fitter Ed. McKay.
Subject: Recommendation for disrating.

1. You are recommended for disrating from quarterman ship fitter at $5.12 per diem to leading man ship fitter at $4.48, for the following reasons:

You have shown a serious lack of the executive ability required of a quarterman, who may be called upon at any time to act as foreman. For example, while in charge of the work on the U. S. A. T. Burnside your inefficient supervision resulted in great confusion and inefficiency in handling the work. In the case of the repairs to the U. S. S. Colorado you have not shown the initiative, the energy, or the control which should be displayed by a quarterman in responsible charge of important work.

2. In accordance with the naval instructions you are furnished with the above copy of the charges and you will be allowed three days for personally answering the same in writing. Your statement should be forwarded to the commandant via the construction officers not later than March 2, 1914.

STUART FAN SMITH.

It so happens that McKay is a very reliable man. He is quiet and retiring in disposition, small of physique, but very popular and thorough. He has worked in the Puget Sound yard for 12 years, was made leading man in 1907, and 6 months later was appointed quarterman ship fitter. From May 27, 1908, to August 27, 1908, and again from June 1, 1912, to September 3, 1912, and again from October 11, 1912, to July 10, 1913, he had served as master ship fitter under his rating as quarterman. His services had been marked and preeminent. Universally admired and trusted, he had received gratuitously and unsolicited many letters of recommendation and indorsement. I here quote three of these letters in full, to show the unqualified nature of his indorsements:

SUPERINTENDING CONSTRUCTOR FOR THE UNITED STATES NAVY, NEW YORK SHIPBUILDING CO.,
Camden, N. J., May 24, 1912.

To whom it may concern:

I have known Mr. Edward MacKay since June, 1905, during my connection with the Puget Sound Navy Yard as assistant naval constructor. During that time Mr. MacKay was quarterman and leading man ship fitter, and in this capacity his work was satisfactory to me. I have found him reliable in carrying out instructions, and he always appeared to be interested in his work. His habits were correct and his personality pleasing. I consider him capable of handling a good force of men effectively.

C. M. SIMMERS,
Naval Constructor, United States Navy.

UNITED STATES NAVAL STATION,
Olongapo, P. I., June 27, 1912.

Mr. ED. MCKAY,
Bremerton, State of Washington, United States of America.

DEAR SIR: It affords me great pleasure to note that I served with you at Bremerton Yard for a period of about four years, during which time you held the rating of quarterman ship fitter, and to state that I found you on all occasions industrious, willing, cheerful, and possessed of a good knowledge of your work and trade.

I would be pleased to recommend you for consideration for any position for which you may apply.

Yours, very truly,

J. H. WALSH,
Assistant Naval Constructor, United States Navy, Construction Officer.

UNITED STATES NAVY YARD,
Mare Island, Cal., May 21, 1912.

TO THE BOARD FOR POSITION OF MASTER SHIP FITTER, Navy Yard, Puget Sound, Wash.:

During the time the U. S. S. Colorado was at the navy yard, Puget Sound, undergoing repairs and having her cage mast installed, Mr. Edward McKay was in charge of the ship-fitter work and frequently came under my personal observation. He handled his work and men in a very thorough manner and gave complete satisfaction in all work coming under the cognizance of the construction and repair department aboard that vessel.

Very respectfully,

WM. O'NEILL,
Chief Carpenter, United States Navy.

Further indorsement and testimonials had been handed him in writing just as emphatic as those quoted by the following persons: Louis B. Warford, chief carpenter, United States Navy, under date of June 6, 1912; G. A. Lazar, chief carpenter, United States Navy, under date of June 20, 1912; J. J. Tynan, general manager Union Iron Works, San Francisco, under date of July 20, 1912; David Rodgers, superintendent hull construction, Seattle Construction & Dry Dock Co., under date of June 15, 1912; J. F. Duthie, former master ship fitter, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of June 17, 1912; W. Greig, quarterman ship fitter, Mare Island Navy Yard, under date of May 25, 1912; S. G. Wolfkill, master machinist, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of May 20, 1912; R. B. Fryett, master electrician, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of June 20, 1912; Bart. Stephenson, master boiler maker, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of June 20, 1912; G. L. Servey, master machinist, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of May 31, 1912; F. W. Chambers, foreman machinist, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of May 20, 1912; Robert Stewart, master joiner, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of May 21, 1912; R. E. Hibbard, foreman sheet-metal workers, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of June 21, 1912; J. H. Warren, master blacksmith, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of June 3, 1912; E. Humphreys, foreman coaling plant, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of May 29, 1912; Thomas Raines, foreman painter, Puget Sound Naval Station, under date of May 23, 1912; and others. All of these join in practically the same recommendations. They tell of working with McKay during his long service, all testify as to his competency, efficiency, and qualifications for advancement to the rating of master ship fitter.

McKay was given three days to answer. He answered in part, as follows:

Reference is made to the inefficient work and confusion on the Burnside, and I am apparently charged with all this, whereas this condition was notoriously due to the system of estimating in both the hull and machinery divisions. I should be charged with some specific point of inefficiency, giving time, place, and job, as I can not answer any general charge applicable to the system or to either division or to any shop under them. Master Ship Fitter McHaffie took entire charge of the Burnside and other work upon his appointment, July 10, 1914; and prior to that time, from October 11, 1912, I was acting master ship fitter and had charge of all work on this ship, as per the following paragraph:

The work on the Burnside was done under the immediate supervision of Lieut. Smead, United States Navy, assisted by Mr. Willits, and I carried out their orders. The details of the work was made by the dispatching office, which was, by the commandant's order, responsible for the work. The estimates as to time required for operations was made by the central planning office, and was in error due to inefficiency. The confusion in handling men was caused by orders issued by Mr. Willits shifting men from ship to shop and from job to job without my knowledge or consent or approval, and for which I can not answer and against which I entered a protest at that time.

In relation to the Colorado, the work was in progress about two months before I went on the ship. I have been handling assigned work on this ship for about three months, and to my knowledge there has been absolutely no objection to my work or to my system of handling the work.

By reverting to the complaint of the workmen, it will be seen that McKay states the condition on the Burnside job after he had been subjected to these charges practically as these workmen had "knocked" earlier.

McKay made a further full statement as to the Colorado, but he was allowed no hearing. The Secretary of the Navy, however, has held up his disrating, and I hope yet that Mr. McKay will not be deprived of the rating he has regularly received after years of service.

I say a different system should be instituted. The officers enjoying shore leave should be for the yards, not the yards for the officers. We ought to repair and manufacture ships and naval supplies for the Government on more of a business basis, with due consideration for the men who do the work.

The Puget Sound naval station is the best naval base and navy yard on the Pacific Ocean. I am not to disparage the worth of any other station. No other station claims to be the equal of Puget Sound. As adjuncts to the station are the magazine site at Ostrich Bay and the torpedo station at Keyport. Puget Sound is the base of the Pacific Fleet. The dockage and anchorage facilities are unsurpassed. No officer who has visited the yard has failed to proclaim its real worth to the Government.

THIRD DRY DOCK NEEDED.

One of the greatest needs of the Puget Sound Navy Yard is the third dry dock, the plans for which contemplate a length of 1,200 feet and a width of 110 feet. As stated in the above excerpt from an address delivered by Rear Admiral V. L. Cottman, commandant of the Puget Sound yard, this station is the only suitable location on the Pacific coast of the United States for a naval base. The Puget Sound yard is not handicapped by treacherous bars or shoals, dangerous rocks, reefs, or shallow water. In every respect it is an admirable and ideal location and should receive the consideration from Congress which it deserves. There is no question as to the need of a third dry dock, when it is considered how many naval vessels will be stationed on this coast in the near future.

When President Roosevelt sent the 16 battleships around the Horn to say howdy-do to Japan, the Secretary of the Navy wired to the commandant of Puget Sound yard as to whether there was room for eight of the battleships to anchor in the vicinity of the yard. The admiral is said to have wired back, "Yes; there is room and anchorage grounds for all the navies of the world here in Puget Sound."

Admiral Cottman, commandant, in a recent address had this to say:

This station has finally come into its own, and is now recognized by all as the only suitable location on the Pacific coast of the United States for a naval base. Consequently steps must be immediately taken to insure increase in equipment and docking facilities in order that it may be ready to care for and maintain the battleship fleet by the time the Panama Canal is completed, for then the entire fleet as a unit will come to the Pacific coast, and you gentlemen in Congress will, of course, see that this fleet remains out here at least half of the time and that this coast gets a fair share of the repair work.

But slight showing has been made by the friends of the yard before the Appropriations Committee this year. A good understanding has not existed. Although the needs were pronounced along many lines, all hands seem to have placed all hope on an appropriation for a third dry dock to be 1,200 feet long and 110 feet wide. The committee planned to make an arrangement with a private concern for a dock at San Francisco, and so for Puget Sound "the cupboard was bare and the poor dog got none." I shall comment later on the San Francisco dock proposition.

Secretary of the Navy George von L. Meyer visited the yard in October, 1910, and was impressed with the many advantages of the location, and after visiting Mare Island, San Francisco, and San Diego, he became aware that Puget Sound is the only body of water on the coast, behind defenses, where our battleship fleet can be properly cared for.

Here are some of the improvements the yard ought to have had this year in addition to the new dry dock:

Estimates for fiscal year 1913–14.

Navy yard:
Yard wall, main gate, etc	$75,000
20-ton crane for gun shed	6,000
Vashon Island course	4,000
Shipfitters' and boiler shop (to cost $360,000)	120,000
Connect erecting shop, machine shop, and boiler shop	40,000

Gunners' quarters	6,000
Magazine	15,000
Shell house	15,000
	1,071,000

We have heard a great deal here about the half-and-half principle for Washington, D. C.—that is to say, that the Government should continue to pay half of all the expenses of governing the city of Washington because of the Government investments here. At the proper time I shall apply that principle to the cities of Bremerton and Charleston. The Government is loath to pay for its own street assessments in these little cities, although they are almost exclusively for governmental activity. There are some concessions along this line I shall ask.

BUILDING WAYS.

There should be constructed at the Puget Sound station building ways, so that transports and other vessels can be constructed, and I hope this will be allowed in the next appropriation bill.

ROLLING STOCK FOR ALASKA RAILROAD.

I have introduced and there is pending in the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the House, if not inconsistent with public business, in connection with the preliminary arrangements for the construction of the Alaska railroad, information as to the feasibility of making necessary provision at the Puget Sound Naval Station for the maintenance of car shops and for the manufacture of cars and other railway equipment to be used in connection with the construction and operation of the Alaska railroad.

This ought to receive favorable consideration. This plant can manufacture for the Government much of the rolling stock and railway equipment for the Alaska railroad, and there is no reason in the world why such plans should not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CLINE). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRYAN, by unanimous consent, was given leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, during the last few days some intimation has been made that citizens of our country have lacked in loyalty who were not ready to accept without protest the judgment of the administration and a majority of this House on Monday, that offensive action be taken for the reasons assigned, toward the head of the Mexican Republic.

So frequently has that suggestion been made that I feel that for a few moments I may properly address myself to the proposition.

Those who make such statements will not make them when they shall have had time to think the matter over with calm deliberation. No matter what may have been the judgment of the American people with regard to policy to be pursued one week ago, the question of loyalty to the country was never an issue. The premises that were ours to define a policy upon last Monday were not the premises of yesterday.

> The moving finger writes, and having writ moves on;
> Nor all your piety and wit can call it back
> To cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

Since Monday last the moving finger in rapid manner has been writing history. But little more than 48 hours ago I voted against the Mexican resolution that its supporters believed would mean peace, because to have voted otherwise would have been to have violated the dictations of my conscience. I believed the resolution would mean war and that it would be taken by Mexico and by the world to mean war.

Sirs, swifter than I had even feared, war has come. American citizens near the boundary line, the dispatches report, have been outraged. The American flag is floating over Vera Cruz and possibly Tampico. American soldiers are now in a foreign land. American blood has been shed. American homes are at this moment in sorrow. War has come.

On Monday it was for us to debate the policy that we would pursue with relation to a foreign country. To-day there can be no debate. Whether or not the policy the House declared for then was right, the policy was defined, and now it becomes my duty, as it becomes the duty of every American citizen, to support the President, and to stand like a wall of granite against our foreign foe.

It matters not now whether we thought that having endured with patience and serenity most grievous outrages for many months the incident of the guns to a salute was a cause for war. It matters not whether we believed that the recognition of the de facto government and giving to that government our moral support would tend to promote peace. It matters not that many of our people regarded Villa and Carranza less worthy than Huerta. It matters not whether we thought that possibly by the concert of action of the United States and the leading nations of South America war could have been averted. It matters not what we thought on Monday, and I confess that all these thoughts were in my mind, the unmasked truth is that war is here, cruel and bloody war. Our hand is at the plow; we can not turn back.

Mr. Chairman, let me refer to the intimation that those of our citizens and those of this Congress who felt that the course recommended was unwise lacked in love and devotion to their country. Gentlemen have spoken of the loyalty of their States. But, sirs, readiness to assume the policy that means war, ensconced as we are in this House Chamber, is not a mark of courage and loyalty, nor is dread of the fearful consequences of war equivalent to a dearth of devotion.

Some of the votes against the resolution of Monday were cast by Representatives from Illinois, the State that contains the ashes of the martyred Lincoln. Does anyone doubt the loyalty of Illinois? Some of the votes were cast by Members from California, from Minnesota, from Utah, from Colorado, Wyoming, and Michigan; some by Members from Washington and Pennsylvania, some by Members from Mississippi, some from New York and from Idaho. Does anyone doubt the loyalty of these States?

Go to the battle fields of the war that tore our country 50 years ago; go to the battle fields on Cuban soil and in the Philippines, and there, as you see the spots where brave men from all the States that I have mentioned fell in battle, know that the States that sent these brave men are loyal.

Some of the votes cast against the resolution of Monday were cast by Representatives from Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, only a few months ago I made an address in the town hall of Oakham in Massachusetts, and as I sat upon the platform and looked about me awaiting the opening of the meeting I saw upon the wall at my right a marble tablet upon which were engraved the names of 18 soldiers from Oakham who had laid down their lives for their country. On the wall at my left was a marble tablet with 18 names. Thirty-six boys went out from that community to die at Bull Run or Vicksburg or Chancellorsville, or on some other field of battle, because they loved their country. The people who live in the town of Oakham to-day are the kinsmen in part of those brave boys, and they are just as loyal, just as devoted, as were those who 50 years ago proved their valor and loyalty even to the last drop of their blood. Gentlemen, I had read of war; I had been on great battle fields where had assembled soldiers from all our country, but I was never so impressed by what war means as I was on the day that I visited the town hall in Oakham and contemplated the lives that were given by one little hamlet in the State that was the cradle of American liberty; and I was told that every hamlet in all that region had made its sacrifice. The word "death" was written over many doors. The lintels were sprinkled with blood; chairs by the fireside were vacant.

The citizens of my own State are as jealous of their country's good name as are the citizens of Massachusetts or as are the citizens of any other Commonwealth. Sixteen years ago war was declared against Spain. Volunteers were called for, and my State responded until her volunteers were turned back. The Government could not take them all. The University of Idaho, my alma mater, sent forth the greatest number of volunteers in proportion to enrollment of all the institutions of like character in the United States. Are her people loyal? Are they devoted? Go into the homes of Idaho to-day from which the companies of that State came and see what your answer will be. Vacant chairs are by the fireside, but devotion is there. Sorrow of mothers and of children and of sisters for brave boys who will never return or who returned maimed in body has hallowed the loyalty of many people to the flag.

On the university campus at my home there stands a monument that tells of the supreme sacrifice of two of the university soldier boys—Paul Draper and Ole Hagberg. Noble boys they were. Their sacrifice has taught us courage, has taught us loyalty, has taught us devotion, but, gentlemen, I hope that such sacrifice has taught us something of the cost of war.

I have stood for exhausting every avenue to avoid war. I have shrunk from war. I have counseled against it and have tried to count the cost. But war is here; and I propose to support the President with all my power and to follow the flag of my country. I trust that no occasion may arise for the summoning of our militia or for the calling for volunteers; but if this may not be averted, the people of Idaho are ready to bear their part of the responsibility that will rest upon our Nation. As for the loyalty of Idaho and her people there can be no doubt. They have learned to volunteer for duty when occasion demands; they are ready now if need be. The hardy and noble sons of my State are willing to make the supreme test for their country, and I am with them. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article in regard to Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the committee for any length at this time. I desire, however, in view of the conditions existing in Mexico to-day, to speak of a matter that may be of some interest to the Members of this House. The father of a distinguished Member, Hon. JEFFERSON M. LEVY, of New York, was appointed the port captain of Vera Cruz by Maj. Gen. Worth, of New York, on April 1, 1847, just after that city had fallen into the hands of the American forces under Gen. Winfield Scott. Maj. Gen. Worth took possession of the city and Capt. J. P. Levy, the father of the distinguished Member from New York, who was appointed captain of the port, was in command of the United States ship America. That vessel had just transported the First Massachusetts Regiment to participate in the assault on that Mexican port.

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] spoke a few minutes ago of the youth of the men who do the fighting. I have had prepared a list of the great naval commanders who have participated in the great naval battles of the world, which will show that most of the commanding, as well as fighting, has been done by comparatively young men. The list is as follows:

Ages at which prominent men have gained naval victories.

	Age.
Themistocles, Athenian general, at the Battle of Salamis, 480 B. C.	34
Octavius, Augustus, defeated Anthony and Cleopatra at the naval battle of Actium Sept. 2, 31 B. C.	32
Don Juan of Austria gained naval victory over the Turks at Lepanto Oct. 7, 1571	24
Drake, Sir Francis, took part in defeat of the Spanish Armada July 29, 1588	48
Hawkins, Sir John, also took prominent part in same engagement	56
Bart, Jean (1650–1702); 1692, destroyed a fleet of nearly 100 vessels at Dunkerque	42
Grasse, Comte Francois (1723–1788); 1780, defeated the English fleet off the Chesapeake Capes	57
Villeneuve, Pierre Charles (1763–1806); 1805, commanded French fleet at Trafalgar	42
AMERICAN.
Bainbridge, William (1774–1833); Dec. 29, 1812, commanding U. S. frigate Constitution when she captured the Java	38
Chauncey, Isaac (1772–1840):
1802, commanding U. S. flagship Chesapeake, Tripolitan War	30
1812, commanding fleet on Great Lakes	40
Decatur, Stephen (1779–1820); Oct. 25, 1812, commanding U. S. frigate United States, captured Macedonian	33
Dewey, George (1837); May 1, 1898, Battle of Manila Bay	61
Du Pont, Samuel F. (1803–1865); Apr. 7, 1863, attack upon Charleston with 9 ironclads	50
Farragut, David G. (1801–1870); Aug. 5, 1864, Battle of Mobile Bay	63
Hull, Isaac (1773-1843); Aug. 19, 1812, commanding U. S. frigate Constitution in combat with the Guerriere	39
Jones, John Paul (1747–1792); Sept. 23, 1779, commanding the Bon Homme Richard in combat with the Serapis	32
Lawrence, James (1781–1813); June 1, 1813, commanding U. S. frigate Chesapeake in combat with the British frigate Shannon. "Don't give up the ship"	32
MacDonough, Thomas (1783–1825); September, 1812, appointed to command naval fleet on Lake Champlain; with a fleet of 14 vessels defeated British fleet with 16 vessels	29
Perry, Oliver Hazard (1785–1819); Sept. 10, 1813, Battle of Lake Erie	28
Porter, David D. (1813–1891); December, 1864–January, 1865, commanded the two assaults on Fort Fisher	51
Preble, Edward (1761–1807); July 25, 1804, attacked Tripolitan fleet; his operations resulted in treaty of 1805	43
Stewart, Charles (1778–1869); Feb. 28, 1815, captured Cyane and Levant	37
Truxtun, Thomas (1755–1822); 1799, 1800, captured the French frigate L'Insurgent after a severe engagement; a second victory over La Vengeance	44
Winslow, John A. (1811–1873); June 19, 1864, commanding U. S. S. Kearsarge in combat with the C. S. S. Alabama	53
Worden, John L. (1818–1897); Mar. 9, 1862, commanding U. S. S. Monitor in combat with Confederate States ironclad Merrimac, in Hampton Roads, Va	44
BRITISH.
Boscawen (1711–1861); Aug. 18, 1759, crowning success, defeat of French Toulon Fleet, Bay of Lagos	48
Collingwood (1750–1810); June, 1794, prominent command under Lord Howe, off Brest	44
Exmouth (Edward Pellew, Viscount), (1757–1833):
1793, knighted after capture of French frigate Cleopatre	36
1799, commanding Impetueux; harrassed French coast and won brilliant actions. Same year his influence and bravery quelled mutiny in Bantry Bay and saved British fleet	42
Hawke (1705–1781):
October, 1747, captured 6 out of squadron of 9 French men-of-war	42
1756, succeeded Admiral Byng in command of the Mediterranean	51
Nov. 20, 1759, intercepted French fleet under Conflans, off Belle Isle; more than half the enemy's force disabled or captured	54
Hood (1724–1816); 1781–82, under Rodney, took part in several famous battles, notably that of Dominica	57
Howe (1725–1799):
1793, War with France. Took command of Channel Fleet	68
1794, gained victory remembered as "the glorious 1st of June." The French fleet, consisting of 26 ships of war and English 25. Howe, in his flagship Queen Charlotte, engaged off Ushant the French admiral's; captured 2 ships of 80 guns and 4 74's; another 74 sank	69
Jervis (Earl of St. Vincent) (1735–1823); Feb. 14, 1797, with 15 ships of the line encountered Spanish fleet of 27 sail off Cape St. Vincent. After being First Lord of the Admiralty at 72 years of age, for second time took command of channel fleet	62
Keppel (1809):
1854–55, commanded naval brigade at Sebastopol during the Crimean War	45
1857–58, on China coast. Destroyed Chinese war fleet in Fatshan Creek	48
1860, commander in chief at Cape of Good Hope	51
1867–1869, commander in chief of China-Japan squadron	58
Nelson (1758–1805); Oct. 21, 1805. Battle off Cape Trafalgar	47
Rodney (1719–1792); Apr. 12, 1782, fame rests upon victory won over the French fleet under De Grasse off Dominica. The battle was more obstinately contested than any other engagement of the war. After 12 hours De Grasse was totally defeated and made prisoner. Naval power of Spain and France ruined	63
Saumarez (1757–1836):
1798, participated in the battle of the Nile	41
July 12, 1801, gained victory over French and Spanish fleets off Cadiz; subsequently commanded Baltic fleet	44
JAPANESE.
Togo, Admiral Heihachiro (1847); 1904–5, commander in chief of Japanese fleet during the Russo-Japanese War	58
DUTCH.
Ruyter (1607–1676); June, 1666, in second war against English in chief command; 90 sail engaged the English fleet; battle lasted four days, ending in partial victory for the Dutch	59
Tromp, Cornelius (1629–1691); June, 1673, fought with consummate bravery against combined English and French fleets under Prince Rupert and d'Estrees, driving the enemy into the Thames. Subsequently fought in the employ of the Danes against the Swedes and later was made commander in chief of the naval forces of the Dutch	44
Tromp, Martin Harpertzoon (1597–1653); May, 1652, his greatest fame in war against England. In May, worsted, yield command to Ruyter. Restored in November; inflicted severe defeat on Blake off Goodwin Sands, and for a time was master of the channel	55

As a matter of fact, the men who to-day are in command of the Navy of the United States are as able and as brave and courageous as any men who ever engaged in battle at any time in the history of the world. If war shall ensue in the near future, they will add new laurels to the brilliant achievements of our Navy in all our wars.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, last Sunday, the 19th day of April, I was talking with friends, and I asked them if they realized that just 139 years before to the day the Revolutionary War had opened by the Battle of Lexington, April 19, 1775, and that just 53 years before that date, April 19, 1861, the first blood was shed in the Civil War, the greatest war known to man, and that just 16 years to the day before that date, April 19, 1898, the Spanish-American War had opened, and that by 6 o'clock that night, which was last Sunday, the provisional head of the Mexican Government was to say whether war was to be the result of our attempts to adjust our differences with Mexico. The month of April seems to be a martial month, and it may be a mere coincidence, I presume it is, and yet a student of history who watches the forces that operate for the civilization of our country can not be entirely oblivious to the similarity of conditions that made possible these conflicts.

I am one of the Members of this House who has had the greatest sympathy with the head of the Nation in his attempt to prevent war. I have questioned now and then, not openly, whether the proper steps were taken by the President, but not as one who desired to criticize, for upon the platform at different times I have said that probably at the opening of the difficulty Huerta could not very well be recognized. The manner of his assumption of authority was repugnant to our sense of justice. I am somewhat concerned about where we ought to have looked for order; certainly not from such men as Villa; whether it would not have been better to have placed the responsibility of order in unhappy Mexico upon this provisional head after the character of the situation had become well known to the country at large. But it is not now a time to criticize. It is not what ought to have been done, but, rather, what must now be done? When the resolution was called up here in the House on Monday last, I do not believe there was a Member on this floor upon either side who voted in an unfriendly attitude toward the President. I am one of the 337 who voted with the President's request. I did not do it because I thought what had been done was the best thing the President could have done, but I did it because in that hour I voted for the dignity of the American Government and with the Executive of the Nation; and those who voted against the resolution were just as patriotic as I am, and they did it not in an unfriendly way toward the head of the Government, but they did it because they thought that it meant war. Gentlemen, I thought that it meant war. I do not see how we can hope that it will not be war.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman think that those of us who voted against the resolution did so because of the manner in which it was presented to the House?

Mr. FESS. I do, and I meant to say that the gentleman was just as patriotic as I was in voting on the other side. I want no line drawn on that point.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I will say right here that I would not give one of my little German boys on the north side in my city of Chicago for the whole of Mexico. If the resolution had been properly presented to this House, I would have voted just as the gentleman did.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend from Illinois that probably he will have to give more than he has expressed willingness to give.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman familiar with the information we have to-day about the close cooperation between the British and the German fleets and the officers of those fleets with the American fleet and the officers of the American fleet at Tampico?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask not to be interrupted, for I am coming to the matter referred to.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. But the gentleman is familiar with the facts as reported?

Mr. FESS. I am.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FESS. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman believe that a Member of the House who bases his vote upon his statement and belief that the President is actuated by personal revenge and resentment is honest in his vote?

Mr. FESS. I will ask the gentleman not to put a question of that kind to me. I can not believe that anyone who is at the head of a nation would purposely do a thing that would involve the Nation in war simply from a matter of pique. However, prejudices are sometimes unconsciously influential in a course pursued.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the gentleman heard the statement made on the floor.

Mr. FESS. I do not know that I did; I do not recall it. I am speaking now in the hope that there will be no partisan division, as I know there will not be, in time of war, for war is here; and while I believe that what has already taken place was inevitable war, I am convinced there are some things worse than war, and one is dishonor. We have in our policy as a Nation a principle that has become fundamental with us to prevent complications on the Western Continent such as constantly disturb Europe. We have the Monroe doctrine, which is being tested now, and has been for more than 13 months. Mexico under President Diaz invited capital from our country as well as citizens from our country; capital from Germany and France and England and citizens from those countries to help develop the resources of Mexico. By this invitation Mexico under Diaz was regarded as a modern constitutional government; but, unfortunately, perhaps, about 65 per cent of its wealth thus developed is possessed by foreigners. And yet there was not a year during the days of Diaz that this constitutional government was not ruled by a mere junta as the arm of the Government in the form of militarism.

The only deterrent to revolution in Mexico was this iron hand, and when the time came that the President was too old to maintain his régime, then the successful revolution came and the President that had been the head of the Government so long was compelled to abdicate, and from that day to now unhappy Mexico has been torn and shattered by factions that are bound to continue until a stronger hand shall be able to take the reins of government. In the past order in Mexico, the absence of open revolution, was the result of ready action. Now that the strong hand has not yet appeared, revolution is rampant, the lives of British subjects are at stake, of German subjects, and French subjects, and American subjects. The wonder expressed is that these countries keep hands off in such times of revolution. Germany, France, and England are keeping hands off, because the Monroe doctrine says in effect, if you will stay out, we will make it unnecessary for you to come in. If, on the other hand, we should say to Germany, France, and England, we prefer not to assume the duty to your citizens, come in and take care of your own citizens, of your own property, I ask you, when they come in, when will they go out? When they demand an indemnity from unhappy Mexico, unable in her torn condition to pay an indemnity, then those countries in concert may demand coaling stations and territory in lieu of the indemnity, as was demanded from China by Japan in 1894. If such a policy is adopted, where is the power that can prevent it? This is a probability we must not allow, and it seems to me that the President is justified in making all possible effort to make it unnecessary for us to compromise the Monroe doctrine, even though it may mean war. If war must come, we must stand by him, every man, without regard to party affiliations here. [Applause.]

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield just for one question?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that both Germany and England have officially recognized the Monroe doctrine as a vital part of our foreign policy?

Mr. FESS. Yes; by certain official acts, but not in expressed words.

Mr. CLINE. And if, recognizing that fact, they did not remit the protection of their citizens in Mexico to the United States under that theory.

Mr. FESS. England recognized the Monroe doctrine in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in 1850.

Mr. CLINE. Well, have not they recognized it since that time officially through the premier of the English Government?

Mr. FESS. England recognized the Monroe doctrine in 1887, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, in the final negotiations of the Venezuela dispute over a boundary line, he will remember that President Cleveland demanded from Lord Salisbury that this matter of boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela, the establishment of the line in 1842 by the botanist, Schomburgk, which England now questioned, should be left to arbitration, and he based it upon the Monroe doctrine. Salisbury said in these words:

> The Monroe doctrine is not international law, no matter how brilliant the statesman who announces it or powerful the Government that supports it.

Then it was that President Cleveland asked this Congress to authorize him to appoint a commission to make investigation, and asked Congress for power to support the findings of the commission. It was then that Salisbury agreed to arbitrate. So they agreed to it, which, in substance, was a recognition of the Monroe doctrine, but there was persuasion back of it.

Mr. CLINE. Is it not a fact that Lord Salisbury stated in that same statement that the Monroe doctrine was very properly a feature of our foreign policy?

But the feature I want to ask you in reference to is this: Has not Germany and England been consistent in keeping out of Mexico and remitting the care of their subjects to the American Government under that declaration?

Mr. FESS. Precisely so. And I say as long as Germany, England, and France do stay out it is rather an obligation on our part to do our share in the protection of their citizens. This is why it strikes me that we are in Mexico to establish order.

Mr. LEVY. Will my colleague yield to me a minute? Has not Great Britain always recognized the Monroe policy?

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. LEVY. They were part of the originators of it.

Mr. FESS. Well, sometimes we originate and back out.

Mr. LEVY. Oh, no. They have always recognized it.

Mr. FESS. The Monroe doctrine was first announced by Richard Canning in 1822, and it was an outgrowth of the Holy Alliance of that year. It was then communicated to our country by Dr. Rush, our minister to England, and was communicated to John Quincy Adams, our Secretary of State, who is really its author, as he writes of it. It was placed in President Monroe's message in 1823. When my friend from New York asked if England has not always stood by it I will say to him that England, whose premier first suggested it, has not always stood by it except when we told her to do so, and then most reluctantly, as in 1887, and again in 1893, and now in the canal agitation, which is still in some doubt.

Mr. LEVY. I differ with you. She was in agreement with the United States that it would be put in force.

Mr. FESS. What about the Venezuelan difficulty?

Mr. LEVY. She agreed to it then.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion, and the question I wanted to ask the gentleman was this: Suppose we go down into Mexico and win the battles that we will win, with whom are we going to make peace? To whom are we going to turn over the control of Mexico, having refused to recognize anybody as being responsible?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that we do not go into Mexico because we want to do so. We go in there because it is our duty, as I see it, to prevent further bloodshed. I know that our going was not placed upon that basis by the President, and probably he did not want to do it in that way, but whatever he wanted to do, whatever his intentions were, we are there now and we are going to stay there until there is order—mark my words. Now, when you ask me with whom we will deal, I do not know. I doubt if our President knows. I sincerely trust it will not be with Villa. That is a most difficult problem, and I frankly say to you that I can not quite agree—but I do not want at such a time to enter upon anything that would seem like a criticism—I can not agree that Huerta has no standing at all in Mexico. That we can not deal with him I hate to have said. I wish we might be free to do so, as he is the head of the only de facto government in Mexico. However, the United States power and majesty are now in Mexico, and I say to you that we will remain there until we establish order. You may ask how will we do it. It will probably be through the system of a protectorate, I presume. I am satisfied it is one thing President Wilson wanted to avoid, and it is one thing that every Member in this Chamber wanted to avoid, for we knew if we would go into Mexico to bring about order we would necessarily have to stay there to preserve it. And when we go in, not invited by either faction, a step that must be looked upon by all Mexicans alike as an invasion, we must know that it will probably unite both factions against us, and we might as well open our eyes to it now. We may call it a work of peace, but it is such peace that is the price of war. I can not believe that people can be misguided to the extent of believing our steps thus far will be looked upon as peaceful. We are in Mexico, and there is nothing else to do save to compel order, and we may as well set about to do it.

Mr. MADDEN. The situation is this, now: Those of us who voted against and those of us who voted for the proposition must stand as one man to maintain the dignity and the honor of our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. That is what I was trying to say, precisely. I do not find any fault with anybody that voted against that resolution. I do not have any words of compliment for myself, who voted for the resolution. We all were afraid of war and we all wanted to avert it, but conditions are such that it is, in my judgment, inevitable and can not now be averted, and we ought to recognize that. Any man that looks over the past 13 months and notices the current of forces and then realizes the situation that emanates from Europe, being complicated by European capital and citizens being invited into Mexico, makes this problem the most serious crisis that this Nation has faced in 50 years. And in this crisis the President of this Nation ought to have the sympathy of every man on this floor, on this side and on that side [applause], because it is not war by choice. Whatever might have been done to avert it, it is now too late to speculate. The logic of events points the way of duty, and it seems to me that when we realize the enormity of the situation it becomes supremely a matter of patriotism and we ought not to inject the differences that might be provoked by my differing from the policy of the President, for we know he was trying to prevent war.

And who of us could have made sure that what he did was not the best thing, and what we might have done would have been a worse thing? It is an easy matter for one not responsible to say what ought to be done, but it is a different matter to be in authority and under responsibility to do it.

I remember how President McKinley was criticized in 1898. I remember how I, as a partisan of his, spoke publicly, saying that McKinley did not have the backbone of a toe string, and I am as ashamed of it now as much as any man is ashamed of me for it. I was in college then and aflame with martial spirit. I wanted the President to do it quickly. But President McKinley had tasted war. He knew that he faced a situation in Cuba where he might touch a match that would produce a conflagration which might involve the whole civilized world, and he was therefore cautious. And yet Members on this side of the House and Members on that side of the House spoke against the President frequently in the eight months preceding the fatal day of February 15, 1898, as if the President were careless and had no regard for the dignity of the country. Knowing, as I do, realizing it, inasmuch as I was a part of the criticism, I now, in the American Congress and as a Member of this body, will go slow in the criticism of the President, who has the burdens in his hands and upon his head. It seems to me that this is a crisis for us to notice with the greatest of care, with a spirit of patriotism, for I think that we can not possibly get out of this difficulty now without a struggle. Here we sit as the Representatives of this great people, proud of our ability in local self-government.

Why, we were the picked people of Europe, and the best equipped of all the nations of the world to govern ourselves. The Constitutional Convention, even before our Nation was born, had 29 college graduates out of a body embracing 56 men, and the 26 who were not graduates included the brainiest men of this young Republic. They were equipped, greatly equipped, for local government—to govern themselves. But what about poor Mexico? We look down there and judge their ability by our own characteristics. On the other hand, you see 100,000 men the governing element of Mexico, out of a total population of 15,000,000. How many of the peons and the Indians know that there is a war; and how many of them know the cause of it? Mexico is not our style of country, although it is called a constitutional government. It is constitutional in name only. The result is unhappy Mexico, torn and bleeding for want of a power to control her; and her people are now not only in war among themselves, but threatening to unite upon us when we offer our office to produce order. The most serious problem is facing us that we have had for 50 years, because the results of this war may multiply the Philippine problem tenfold. We all want to see it avoided, because we do not want to take on those additional problems that now seem to be threatening to fall to us.

These are the reasons why I appeal to the House of Representatives that in this hour of crisis we do not want to say or do anything that will in any way cripple the administration toward the working out of peace.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentelman from Massachusetts?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. May I just suggest to the gentleman that the information about the attitude of the German and British fleets and the officers of them has greatly diminished, to my mind, the seriousness of the crisis? Will the gentleman direct himself to that phase of the matter?

Mr. FESS. The only trouble about that, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, is that when a step is taken it is so delicate to retrace it, to undo it in a manner preserving our honor and our dignity. I know the attitude of the foreign countries thus far, and I am hoping that that attitude of favorable regard will continue.

Mr. MADDEN. There never was any doubt about what their attitude would be, I assume. It is simply a question of whether we ought to have gone to war or not. We have to deal with the north of Mexico.

Mr. FESS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if we stand upon the Monroe doctrine, as I presume we will, then we stand in the shoes of those foreign countries, and that really necessitates our preserving order down there in Mexico. That is what I mean. It means we are going in there to produce order, which will keep us there to preserve it.

Mr. MADDEN. We are in there.

Mr. FESS. And when we go in we have to stay in until we satisfy the demands of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. MADDEN. To go in and stay in right, we have got to go in from both sides, the north and the south.

Mr. FESS. Probably we will.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what we ought to do.

Mr. KAHN. I believe, as the gentleman has said, that the time has come when every Member of Congress ought to give his full support to the administration in whatever action it may take in Mexico; but I want to call the attention of my friend to the fact that this matter has come very suddenly, has it not?

Mr. FESS. It has come suddenly, but I expected it. Did not you?

Mr. KAHN. I predicted it two months ago.

Mr. FESS. So did I.

Mr. KAHN. And I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: We are again discussing a bill for the appropriations for the Navy of the United States. The bill provides for two battleships. The gentleman recalls that whenever the appropriation bills for the Army and the Navy Establishments have come up in this House and Members have insisted on the upbuilding of an efficient Navy and the maintenance of an adequate Army, they have been severely criticized because they wanted their country ready for any emergency, such as the present emergency, should it again arise in our country.

Mr. FESS. I will say to the gentleman, in reference to that, my position on the Navy is simply this: You can not insure the peace of the world unless you place in the hands of the peace-loving governments the power to command the peace of the world.

Mr. KAHN. I agree with that.

Mr. FESS. That is the whole thing.

Mr. KAHN. But the country can better help command the peace of the earth when you have an adequate Army and Navy, and not when you are unprepared.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Bearing in mind the disparity between this country and the poor, helpless, feeble country to the south of us, we have certainly got both an adequate Army and Navy, and still that has not kept us out of war with Mexico.

Mr. KAHN. But we are ready, without the usual delay incident to getting ready, to maintain the honor and dignity of the country at a moment's notice.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We are always ready to do that.

Mr. FESS. And we want to be not only ready, but prepared.

Mr. CLINE. I think the gentleman in his last two or three sentences left the impression with the House—although I am sure he did not intend to leave that impression—that we have gone into Mexico in this difficulty primarily to protect the Monroe doctrine. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not his understanding that that is an incident and a result of our invasion of Mexico, but not the primary cause at this time?

Mr. FESS. I did not mean to say that we went into Mexico in order to uphold the Monroe doctrine. I meant that the result of our going in will call upon us to meet the requirements of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. CLINE. That is the idea I wanted to have the gentleman leave with the House, that the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine is a result and not a cause of our invasion.

Mr. FARR. Is it not one of the reasons why we were so much interested in peace in Mexico?

Mr. FESS. When we go in to preserve order, it will be a reason why we will stay there until we get order established, and that makes it a serious problem.

Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make this speech. I have been stirred considerably by the situation that confronts us, and it seems to me that we are all one in our support of the administration, to make the most out of this serious situation with the least inconvenience, loss of life, and loss of national dignity; and I want to rise, as a Republican, to explain my view of the attitude of those who voted against the resolution, because that question was raised a while ago by one of the speakers here, and also to assure the public that I do not think I was any more patriotic when I voted for the resolution than those people were when they voted against it. But now the differences ought to cease, and we ought to stand foursquare and march in unison against any effort that would in any way cripple the present administration in dealing with Mexico in the way best for Mexico and best for ourselves. In there we are, and in there we will stay until order is restored. [Applause.] We will do it as best we can; peaceably, if we can; but, mark you, men, it will be done in no uncertain way and in a warlike manner if we must. [Applause.] That is the situation that faces us, and meet it we will with an unbroken front. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Missouri if he is prepared to use any more of his time this afternoon?

Mr. HENSLEY. I am not.

Mr. PADGETT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. SAUNDERS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 14034) and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 24, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. KIRKPATRICK, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15959) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 566), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 55) for the relief of Daniel Hampton, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 567), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12909) to correct the military record of James W. McGreevey, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 568), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray Thee to give us a profound sense of our obligation to Thee. We are not unmindful of the abundant providences that have been vouchsafed to us. We remember and are more and more impressed with the solemn fact that we must meet issues that are not only tried at the bar of human reason but the profounder issues that must stand the test of the Divine justice. We pray Thee to give us wisdom and grace for the duties that are upon us. Give us humility of spirit, sincere hearts, and an obedient will. Save us from mistakes of judgment, from pride of opinion, from conceits of ignorance. May we be clothed with the spirit of Christ, that we may perform the duties that are upon us in Thy fear and with Thy continued favor. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

STATUE OF ZACHARIAH CHANDLER.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to take up House concurrent resolution 36 for immediate consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a message from the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a House concurrent resolution. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was read and considered by unanimous consent, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people, of Michigan for the statue of Zachariah Chandler, whose name is so honorably identified with the history of that State and of the United States.

Resolved, That this work of art is accepted in the name of the Nation and assigned a place in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, already set aside by act of Congress for statues of eminent citizens, and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings incident to the dedication of this statue may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Michigan. Unless there is objection, it will be granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The proceedings referred to are as follows:

PROCEEDINGS AT THE UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, STATUARY HALL, UNITED STATES CAPITOL, MONDAY, JUNE 30, 1913, 11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Senator WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH, of Michigan (chairman). The service which we have met here to perform will be opened with prayer by the Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., of Port Huron, Mich., Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

OPENING PRAYER.

The Chaplain of the House of Representatives, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Great God, our King and our Father, whose spirit pervades all space with rays divine, a very potent factor in shaping and guiding the progress of men and of nations through all the vicissitudes of the past, we rejoice that the long struggle for civil, political, and religious rights culminated in a Nation "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

We thank Thee that from time to time Thou hast raised up patriots who have woven their characters into the tissues of this Nation and made it strong and great. We are here in the memory of such a man, fitted by nature and by preparation for the work Thou didst call him to do. He gave to his State and Nation the best that was in him, and left behind him a record worthy of emulation. In placing his statue here in this Hall of Fame the people of his State honor themselves and add to the group of illustrious heroes and statesmen here represented a son of whom they may well be proud. Long may it stand, to speak in mute eloquence of "liberty and union, one and inseparable, now and forever."

Let Thy blessing be upon these services, that they may be recorded upon the pages of history and redound to Thy glory and to the good of mankind. In the spirit of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ADDRESS OF THE CHAIRMAN, SENATOR WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH.

Senator SMITH of Michigan. My friends, as the senior in service of the Michigan congressional delegation, I have been directed to take charge of the program. My part shall be very brief, and in passing I desire to say that we have assembled in this historic place as the representatives of State and Nation to do honor to one whose public service contributed so much toward the welfare of the people and the glory of his country. It was peculiarly fitting that Zachariah Chandler should have represented Michigan in the Senate of the United States at a time when rugged faith and sublime confidence were so essential to the permanence of the Republic.

His giant-like form, his innate honesty, his unclouded vision, his dauntless courage, and his masterful personality shone like a beacon light through the darkness and gloom of our Nation's greatest peril, while the warmth of his stout heart and his ever-present sympathy cheered the faltering, ministered to the needy, and cared for the suffering on unnumbered battle fields. To him the sadly bereft and afflicted turned with confidence, while the unconsoled mother who had dedicated her only son to Lincoln's cause knew that Chandler would not countenance unnecessary danger or sacrifice, and the Government of which he was a part was made more glorious by his unflinching devotion to human liberty. [Applause.]

To the soldier at Gettysburg or in the Wilderness his eloquent voice was like a bugle call to action, and inspired our soldiers and national leaders with new strength and faith in the perpetuity of American institutions.

He was no traitor to his country or his party. His optimism was of that quality which could circumvent any disaster. His was the highest type of virile, western statesmanship, and his iron will could not be broken or blunted, while he wore upon his brow the cardinal jewels of his political faith.

He was a stranger to fear and a deadly foe to venality in every form. He was the generous product of mountain and valley and forest and sea, and his imperious form was unswayed by tempest and storm. The fiercer the growl of treason and disunion, the more dauntless his spirit and the more inspiring his leadership; the heavier the load, the more massive his form became, until the people of Michigan came to believe that there was no limit to his patriotism or endurance. When column after column broke, his Herculean shoulders steadied the structure of state until the foundations could be repaired.

His last battle was relentlessly waged against the puerile political decadence of his time, and the stalwart blows he delivered against the financial fallacies of that period quickened the lagging spirit of the faint-hearted and smote the visionary doctrinaire in a vital spot.

It was, indeed, a farseeing eye that blazed the way for Zachariah Chandler's entrance into the public life of his country, and the century that has passed since he was cradled in the mountains of the Old Granite State has produced no more inspiring figure among the conservators of the Republic.

In this niche Michigan places her final contribution to this brilliant galaxy of the dead, and future generations can find much of inspiration in the lives of all, while not the least of these now takes his place at the instance of the State he so faithfully served.

I count it among the priceless privileges of my life to have been permitted to come into personal contact with this masterful man, and this hour could not be devoted to a worthier purpose than the initial step in the permanent perpetuation of his memory.

I pause to call upon Chandler Hale, grandson of the great Chandler, to unveil his statue.

[The statue, which was draped in a large American flag, was then unveiled by Mr. Chandler Hale. The appearance of the statue was greeted with applause.]

Senator SMITH of Michigan. In yonder Chamber, which was the immediate scene of his countless activities, we shall at some future time present some phases of his legislative career, and this present ceremony will now be conducted by those especially charged by the Commonwealth of Michigan to perform this patriotic duty.

I take especial pride in presenting to you Mr. Arthur H. Vandenberg, of Grand Rapids, Mich., the honored chairman of the commission, who exemplifies in his character and attainments the wholesome spirit of this occasion. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF MR. ARTHUR HENDRICK VANDENBERG.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the Commonwealth of Michigan to-day challenges the attention of the Nation to the quality and fiber of Michigan manhood and citizenship as typified in one of the strongest characters illuminating the page of nineteenth century American history.

We have come from our beloved State to offer tribute to the memory of Zachariah Chandler, and to ask the people of the United States to accept from us this heroic statue, which shall stand through unnumbered years as the testimonial of a people who are free and nationally unified because such democratic noblemen as he dedicated their surpassing talents to the common good.

It was wise national legislation which brought this Statuary Hall into existence—here in the Capitol Building that breathes liberty in every stone and column—to perpetuate the memory of crusaders for humanity and good government.

In an all-too-forgetful age it is well that such patriotic shrines should reinspire the thoughts of generations which profit from the self-sacrificing labors of the fathers who toiled and builded and kept the faith that we might inherit our legacy unimpaired.

It was equally wise legislation—in the State—which two years ago nominated Zachariah Chandler to occupy Michigan's second niche in the Nation's Hall of Fame, because neither Michigan nor any other Commonwealth ever gave a statesman to the Nation who wrought in more imperishable deed for the preservation and the glory of his country.

In a time that tried men's souls—through rebellion and then through reconstruction—his intrepid courage was an inspiration for right and justice, his words resembled battles, and his countless achievements spelled service that counted large for the cause which martyrized the saintly Lincoln and immortalized the resistless Grant.

I speak for the State commission which was intrusted with responsibility for the erection of this statue. Our task is done. We believe that Sculptor Charles H. Niehaus has faithfully portrayed the rugged greatness of a master among men.

We publicly acknowledge our debt of gratitude to all who have aided us in whatever measure of success our efforts have attained and, as chairman of the commission, I want particularly to pay my personal word of appreciation for the debt that I owe to my fellow members on the commission, Mr. Charles M. Greenway and Mr. Kirke S. Alexander.

I wish, too, to say a word for Sculptor Niehaus, who has continuously given us the benefit of his ceaseless efforts and untiring interest. And last, but not least, I must say to you that we are under everlasting obligation to Mrs. Mary Chandler Hale, the daughter of this great man, who has exhibited a continuous interest in our work, who has given us the benefit of inspiring suggestion, and who is kept from attendance upon this memorable occasion only by the serious illness of her own distinguished husband.

We believe that the statue will merit approval from Michigan and the Nation; and, pursuant to instructions from the commission, I make bold to sketch in briefest way the thoughts regarding Chandler which have inspired us in our task.

Michigan particularly extends greetings upon this memorable occasion to one of her elders in the sisterhood of States; for while Chandler's mature accomplishments were all inspired by the splendid glory of his western citizenship, his birthplace was amid the granite hills of old New Hampshire.

The Commonwealth which from early youth became the home of his loyal adoption is entitled to this honor of preserving Chandler's fame in this marble that will endure with all the ages through which the Republic is destined to live.

But the State which gave him birth, at Bedford, on December 10, 1813—one full century ago—may borrow a reflection of our pride.

New Hampshire is ostensibly represented in this Hall of Fame by two heroic figures into whose eternal association a third now comes.

Over yonder stands John Stark, a warrior patriot whose honors are written from Bunker Hill to Bennington in chapters of a life story dedicated to the establishment of this free and independent Government.

Near by is the mighty, masterful Daniel Webster, who first stripped the doctrine of nullification to a nakedness that shamed it before the world; Webster, who lived to save the integrity of union even as Stark lived to serve in its erection.

Yet, with full and appreciative acknowledgment of the self-sacrifice and patriotism of both these Titan figures, we of the West respectfully submit that when New Hampshire gave Zachariah Chandler to Michigan—there to be matured into dynamic manhood—New Hampshire sired a son who combined the uncompromising courage of a Stark and the sublime Union loyalty of a Webster—a son who wrought in word and deed for the preservation of free government in as exalted and effective degree as any single patriot who ever swore allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

If by some black art Gabriel's horn could sound an alarm of resurrection that should galvanize this bronze and marble congress into life, we should find ourselves in the intimate presence of many of the Nation's great—men whose lives chapter and vitalize the story of American development. It would be a wonderful assembly—such a parliament as never met in flesh and never will.

But among all these earnest, intellectual, stalwart, aggressive, patriotic, broad-brained men and women we are proud in our faith that there would be no peer to Lewis Cass and Zachariah Chandler, sons of Michigan, servitors of the Republic, representatives of that sterling citizenship which has electrified the great Northwest with currents of progress and patriotism—deserved favorites in history; none of better right to win perpetuated fame and endured affection in this inspired rotunda.

After Cass had honored Michigan through a lifetime of devoted service to the public weal, Michigan honored Cass in 1889 by accepting the Nation's invitation to here dedicate a shaft to his hallowed memory; and for nearly one-quarter of a century visitors to this most beautiful and most powerful Capitol in all the world have looked upon his rugged face and stalwart figure to catch from them a suggestion of that power and purpose which made him strong—aye, superb—as governor, ambassador, Senator, Cabinet counselor, and contender for the Presidency.

It is fitting now that Michigan's second contribution to this gallery of immortals should commemorate the one who took up the burden of leadership when Cass laid it down, who became the spokesman for his State and for his party fully as dominantly as Cass had been in much less perilous times, who donned the armor of a fearless crusader against slavery and secession, and who, among all his stalwart fellow statesmen, veritably became the plumed knight of free union to captain the brave-hearted band of heroes who upheld the hands of Lincoln in a Congress that was rebellion's lair.

Those bitter days are over, and what may be said to-day is said with fullest honor and appreciation for those whose consciences aligned them on the other side. Fields that ran red with blood in the chill of cold November are green with the harvest of July. Unity that was once merely constitutional has given way to unity that is both constitutional and loved. North and South each honor the other's Rebellion heroes. There is no statue in this Hall upon whose granite pedestal I would more gladly place a wreath of esteem and affection than that of the great Robert E. Lee. [Applause.] What we say of the record of this man to whom this day is dedicated is merely the unchangeable story of history which must be told as it occurred. And it is from the picture of fearlessness and courage and uncompromising conviction which the story yields that one may catch the reason why this particular favorite son has earned Michigan's belated favor at this hour.

Michigan's history is rich in men well worthy of honor in this Hall of Fame. Michigan wishes she might rear to all a memorial worthy of the nobility of each. But since one alone must be selected for the recognition of this hour, there can be little division of farseeing opinion that Zachariah Chandler is rightfully the colossus to whom belongs premier appreciation.

Among all the statues in this Hall I believe I am correct in saying that only one commemorates any of Chandler's confrères when he first entered national life in the Senate of the United States on March 4, 1857, and in the chamber now occupied by the Supreme Court took oath to support the Constitution of the Union—an oath as dear to him as life itself. That great Congress, which entered upon responsibilities surpassing almost any ever undertaken by parliament of man before or since, has been solely represented here by Samuel Houston, from the State of Texas—Houston, who made Texas free and then brought her into the Republic.

If Samuel Houston could speak this morning from his splendid pedestal over yonder, he would subscribe to every word of eulogy that may be said for Zachariah Chandler, and out of richly wonderful experiences in a Congress where Chandler never yielded jot or tittle to secessionist or traitor he would congratulate Michigan and the United States upon the glory of this hour. [Applause.]

Probably no man other than Lincoln himself was more steadfast, unyielding, grimly courageous, and unhesitatingly defiant in his opposition to slavery and secession. What this Nation owes to Lincoln for his leadership, partaking of divinity, during the dark days of the sixties it owes in proportionate measure to Chandler for his lesser but terribly potential work.

Chandler it was who early practiced the tenets of his faith in abolition through liberal support of "the underground railroad," of which Detroit was one of the most important terminals.

Chandler it was who led the party of antislavery as its nominee for governor of Michigan in its first great fight for recognition.

Chandler it was who headed the Michigan delegation to the first Republican national convention, where as a delegate he was one of the five who first voted for Lincoln as a vice presidential candidate.

Chandler it was who went to the United States Senate as the successor of Cass when Michigan demanded that her representative at Washington should reflect our sturdy faith in the perpetuity of the Union.

Chandler it was who immediately became the chieftain in the historic preliminary legislative battles which preceded the Civil War itself.

He knew from first to last no faltering, no doubt, no fear, and could never bring himself to look with patience upon any proposal for compromise.

Chandler it was who voiced the indignation of the patriotic North against the immortally notorious Lecompton constitution for Kansas.

It fixed Mr. Chandler's position definitely, not only as it demonstrated his ability, but as it raised him in the far advance of radicalism in the Senate, a position which he never deserted and for which he never apologized.

When Buchanan, with monstrous temerity, was ready to permit South Carolina to secede it was Chandler who arose to the emergency, "and men instinctively stood aside to give place to the national leader whom the occasion had raised up."

With a vigor and steadfastness for which this Nation must be forever his debtor, Chandler fought treason and its promoters at every turn of the road. He opposed the Crittenden compromise and condemned every suggestion that peace be purchased by dishonor. It remained for him to echo the Lincoln axiom in his famous letter of February 11, 1861, when, decrying the hesitancy of business men to face the possibility of war, Chandler wrote:

Without a little blood letting this Union will not, in my estimation, be worth a rush.

When Sumter fell it was Chandler who came back to Michigan and vitalized the presidential call for troops. Read this from authentic history:

Every Michigan soldier knew old "Zach" by name, thousands knew his face, and hundreds have him to thank for acts of kindness and words of cheer. The dustiest, ragged bluecoat applicant for his aid had a claim to royal precedence, and they all knew that if they needed influence or money they had but to ask him. Not the iron rule of Stanton himself could avail to delay him in such a service.

Chandler was the guiding spirit of the famous committee on "The conduct of the war," which throughout the terrific conflict was the inspiration and invaluable support of the President and his Secretary of War.

It would take a volume of endless size to tell the whole story. Every act of Chandler was an act of a staunch and courageous patriot. No taint of dishonesty, no suggestion of dishonor, no intimation of selfish or improper motives ever attached to his slightest act.

He was the confidant of Lincoln and became the confidant of Grant.

He was Grant's Secretary of the Interior, where his administration is spoken of as "the best in its history."

I hold in my hand a letter from former President of the United States William H. Taft, whose honored father served in the Cabinet of Grant with Zachariah Chandler, which letter is as follows:

NEW HAVEN, CONN., June 14, 1913.

Mr. A. H. VANDENBERG,
The Grand Rapids Herald, Grand Rapids, Mich.

MY DEAR MR. VANDENBERG: I have yours of June 10 with reference to the dedication of a statue to Mr. Zachariah Chandler. I am not very familiar with Mr. Chandler's life. My father valued his sturdy patriotism, the wonderful force of his personality, and his bluff directness and honesty of expression. He believed the country greatly indebted to him for his patriotic activities at a time when she was in great need.

Sincerely, yours, WM. H. TAFT.

Chandler was chairman of the Republican national committee through the historic campaign which gave Hayes the Presidency, and in this trying position he displayed that executive capacity and relentless aggressiveness which contributed so fundamentally to his dominance wherever he was concerned. He seemed the very incarnation of resistless persevering power.

Had he been spared his sudden death, he would probably have succeeded Hayes as President of the United States. He was of presidential caliber and vision and popularity.

As a merchant before entering public life he exhibited a genius that brought him fortune.

As a statesman, after he left the ways of commerce far behind, he was a master.

As a stanch Republican he was unfaltering in his devotion to his party's cause, a devotion so sincere that it earned him the respect of enemy and friend alike.

And last, but far from least, as a husband and a father he was as kindly and considerate and thoughtful and good as man ever was or could be.

When this great Michigan giant suddenly passed into another life, during the night of November 1, 1879, there was national recognition of a national loss. Proof, suggestive of the place he held in universal esteem, shows in the following phrase borrowed from the comment of that time:

It may be doubted whether since the assassination of Abraham Lincoln any single announcement has so startled the public mind and moved the popular heart as when it was announced that Zachariah Chandler was found sleeping his last sleep.

A Nation as well as the State of Michigan—

Wrote Gen. Grant—

mourns the loss of one of her most brave, patriotic, and truest citizens. Senator Chandler was beloved by his associates and respected by those who disagreed with his political views. The more closely I became connected with him the more I appreciated his great merits.

The tributes to his virtuous, vigorous valor were legion. The peoples of Commonwealths from near and far came to mourn before his ashes. Garlands of love and appreciation piled high his bier. Eulogy was universal. A chieftain worthy the truest traditions of the race had crossed the bar.

Dr. Pierson spoke from the pulpit of Chandler's church in Detroit, the city which this great man had honorably served as chief executive when he first dedicated his masterful talents and intrepid courage to the common good.

The Doric pillar of Michigan has fallen—

Said he—

but the State stands, and God can set another pillar in its place. There is stone in the quarry, columns are taking shape * * * and in God's time they shall be raised to their place.

To-day, Mr. Chairman, the Doric pillar of Michigan is raised again in image.

After two years of faithful labor on the part of the commission of which I am proud to be a member the column has taken suggestive shape, and, true to prophesy, it has been raised where it belongs—here in the Nation's Hall of Fame.

May it not only breathe some small measure of Michigan's appreciation for one who honored her as few sons have honored Commonwealth, but may it also inspire to-morrow's citizenship to strive honorably, fearlessly, and in self-sacrifice that the Republic may always be preserved.

To you, sir, Mr. Governor, as the representative of Michigan's near 3,000,000 souls, I have the honor, on behalf of the commission, to tender you this shaft to the memory of Zachariah Chandler—this heroic statue which, by legislative authority, Michigan desires you to present to the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Senator SMITH of Michigan. I now take great pleasure in presenting the lieutenant governor of Michigan, Hon. John Q. Ross, who receives this statue from the commission, and in turn will present it to an official of the Government of the United States.

ADDRESS OF LIEUT. GOV. JOHN Q. ROSS.

Lieut. Gov. ROSS. Mr. Chairman, in this room, made sacred by so many important actions affecting the General Government, it is but fitting that we should gather for the purpose of paying our respects to one of the mighty men who was a vitalizing force in making this country what it is to-day.

I want, first, on behalf of the people of the State of Michigan, to thank this commission, whose earnest efforts have made the success of this occasion possible. In every undertaking, such as the erection of this statue, it is necessary to find men who are willing to give of their time and talents that the desired object may be accomplished in such a way as to meet the intent and desires of the people as a whole. I feel that it is but just that I should say here that the people of Michigan realize that no better selections could have been made as members of the commission in charge of this work. This statue will always stand as a testimonial to their faithful discharge of the duties imposed upon them.

The effect of events such as this is impossible for us to estimate. As we are here to-day, enjoying the blessings of this free Government, we are prone to overlook the things which have made this occasion possible. It is so easy for us to forget the men whose high ideals and whose devotion to duty have aided in the upbuilding and preservation of this Government. In the mad rush for place and power and competence which our people are making, the one thing which we need more than anything else is such object lessons as this statue as constant reminders that our happiness and our every opportunity are interwoven with the efforts and accomplishments of the men who have lived before.

It is an inspiration to live in such a country, but it is more inspiring to live in this country because of such men as Zachariah Chandler. The reading of his history spells opportunity to every young man.

The chairman of the commission has so eloquently pictured Senator Chandler's success that I hesitate to say anything in addition to what he has already said, although I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I did not again call attention to the fact that Senator Chandler overcame every handicap with which his early life was surrounded. He started in life with what would be considered at this time a very meager education; the money furnished to him by his father at the time he located in Michigan would not now be regarded as sufficient in amount to be of very substantial advantage in securing a start in business life. But he had something better than a college education; he had something better than a large sum of money—he had implanted within him that spirit which caused him to choose the right with invincible resolution, to resist the sorest temptations from within and without, to face the greatest storms of his business and political activities with that calm and fearless determination which could mean nothing but success. Some have urged that he lived in an age of opportunity; that his location in Michigan was at a peculiarly opportune time, and for that reason he should not be given full credit for all of the things his life and accomplishments stand for. That would not be a fair measure of the man and would lose sight of the fact that so many other men lived amidst similar surroundings, lured by the same beckonings by the goddess of fate, yet their lives meant nothing to the State or to the Nation at large. I am reminded of the words of John B. Gough, when he said that—

> If you want to succeed in the world, you must make your own opportunities as you go on. A man who waits for some seventh wave to toss him on dry land will find that the seventh wave is a long time in coming. You can commit no greater folly than to sit by the roadside until some one comes along and invites you to ride with him to wealth and influence.

It was not opportunity that made him a success; it was that continual preparedness and fixity of purpose which took advantage of the opportunities that other men allowed to go by.

He applied business principles to every question that came up. His good sense, clear views, ready and retentive memory, quick discernment, and instinctive perception of the fitness of ways to ends qualified him for energetic and successful effort anywhere. These things recommended him to the people of his home city, and they chose him for their chief executive. His administration of that office more than demonstrated the wisdom of their choice. His fair dealing with his customers scattered over the State of Michigan made a host of sincere and admiring friends. He was one of the dominant spirits in the organization of the Republican Party, and when the opportunity came for the people of Michigan to select a United States Senator who would be in thorough sympathy with and should faithfully represent their determined opposition to any further compromise in the matter of the question of slavery, which then hung like a cloud of doubt and disaster over this country, their minds naturally turned to Mr. Chandler, in whom they had implicit confidence because he had stood foursquare to every question which had come up. They recognized in him a strong and determined man. The very stumblingblocks which had caused others to falter and turn back had been for him stepping-stones in the pathway of success.

When he arrived at Washington as one of the Senators from our State he found the men of his own faith trembling for the future, ready and anxious to offer any compromise to avert further trouble or possible bloodshed. He was one of the men upon whom opposition acted as a tonic; who, upon hearing of a threat, rose refreshed and ready for the conflict. The opposition had intimidated by their attitude and their threats, and it awaited his advent upon the scene of action for the intrepid spirits of the Senate to get together and meet the opposition upon its own ground. His very determination and uncompromising attitude roused bitter antagonisms and caused to fall upon his head the most scathing denunciation, but to him this only meant more vigorous efforts. The intensity of his conviction, his tireless energy of action, inspired confidence, gave courage to the hesitating, and caused the timid and irresolute to stand erect. No one can measure the importance of his service in the preparation for and during that mighty conflict which we designate in history as the Civil War. The success or failure of the Union cause and what it stood for on many occasions hung by so slender a thread that the taking away of the strength and the determination of his support might have meant disaster.

His experience and training enabled him to obtain a broad view of the questions of government which he was called upon to consider; he could see and appreciate, as few were able to do, all of the phases of the matter under discussion.

After the war was over, and during the reconstruction period, he was one of the men whose counsel was most often sought. It is true that his idea as to the treatment of the men who had been in open rebellion against the Government was more drastic, possibly, than that employed; but this attitude grew out of his firm belief in the righteousness of the Union cause and the unrighteousness of the Confederate contention. The very intensity of his belief and of his devotion made him all the more determined in his opposition to the extension of any leniency toward those who had been the leaders in the Confederacy. Nothing in his whole life aroused so much criticism as this, and yet, viewed from this lapse of time, we must admit that this very attitude on his part and on the part of some of his conferees resulted in the course being taken which has proven to be most advantageous for all. His opposition was not toward any individual or because of any individual, but was against the principle which those individuals had represented. He believed in a union of the States which should for all time keep the Stars and Stripes floating unsullied in every hamlet and where no man should be held in involuntary servitude. The success of the principle he stood for is the glory of the Republic.

As a business man his success is measured by the good name he left as much as by the fortune he accumulated; as a statesman the appreciation of his accomplishments will increase with passing years; as an administrator he had the faculty of directing the efforts of those under him to do that which was necessary, shorn of any cumbersome detail; as the leader of a great party he marshaled its hosts against united opposition and led them to the summit of victory; as an orator he never tried to get or hold the attention of his auditors by a mere play of words, but compelled their understanding by the force of his logic. He had the power to destroy the most eloquent and seductive sophistry by a few terse sentences.

It was given to him to read the future as it is given to few men. In his business he planned for the future of Michigan, and could see it grow and develop as the subsequent years have seen it grow and develop. In his contemplation of the affairs of the Nation he appreciated as fully as was given to anyone to appreciate what the differences between the North and the South meant to the Nation and to the future. He realized that while there might have been a time when these differences could have been settled without an open conflict, the vacillating attempts at compromise with a system which was inherently wrong had, before his entrance into national affairs, developed a situation which could only be adjusted by open conflict; that the sooner the conflict came, the better it would be for the Nation at large, and the more easy it would be to settle it in the manner in which it was settled and which is now admitted was the best for all. He believed in more vigorous methods than were adopted. He insisted that the President should call 500,000 troops instead of 75,000. His counsel was never for anything except the most aggressive action in the prosecution of the war. His very nature was against any halfway measure. His faith was not a shrinking, half-believing faith; he believed with all the vigor and firmness of a perfect physical manhood. When his reason led him to a conclusion in his mind, that alone was right—that was the thing to work for and to fight for. Others might contend against his position, but his resolution was unchangeable.

It is impossible for me in the short space of time I shall occupy to enter into any detailed discussion of the wonderful personality or work of Senator Chandler. His was a life so filled with effort and accomplishment that we need to study it carefully in order to appreciate its real meaning.

No words of mine can adequately portray the significance of this statue; it means that the efforts of the men who came over to this shore to found a government of free men might have been wasted had it not been for the determination of character of Senator Chandler; it means that the flame of bitter antagonism of the early sixties, had it not been for his zeal, might have become national instead of sectional, and still be burning, separated by the Mason and Dixon line; it means that this reconstructed Government is better because of his having lived, that his standing for a sound financial policy made a more stable system of currency than we would otherwise have had; it means that the administration of the several departments of the Government are upon a more businesslike basis, that the Government is receiving a more adequate return in service from its employees, because, as Secretary of the Interior, he put into active practice in that department the same thorough, conscientious business methods which had made his own business ventures so signally successful; it means that in this great and reunited country, because of his life and achievements, every boy can more fully realize that he only needs a firm determination and a conscientious and constant application to write upon the scroll of his achievement, in living letters of brightest hue, that word for which we all strive, success; it means that the people of a great State are not forgetful of their obligations to those who, by their accomplishments and fidelity, have shed a luster upon them, and whose energy and ability and never-yielding patriotism have contributed in so large a degree to their success and material well-being. On behalf of that State, and with a thorough appreciation of all that this occasion means, and a firm belief that this Nation shall always continue to be the world's brightest hope for liberty and equality, I have the honor of presenting this statue to the people of the United States, that they may share with Michigan its glory and satisfaction in the life and achievements of Zachariah Chandler. [Applause.]

Senator SMITH of Michigan. It had been expected that Hon. Henry B. Brown, retired justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, would receive this statue in behalf of the Federal Government. Justice Brown has written a letter of singular beauty and appropriateness regarding the life of Senator Chandler. That letter is as follows:

WATKINS GLEN, N. Y., June 15, 1913.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am informed by Mr. Vandenberg, of Grand Rapids, that I am indebted to you for a most courteous invitation to participate in the ceremonies attending the placing of a statue of the late Senator Chandler in Statuary Hall on the 30th of this month. It is with much more than ordinary regret that I am compelled by my physical condition to decline an honor which would have been, of all things, the most agreeable to accept. The truth is, I am sadly out of health and am instructed to remain here until the 1st of August, and can not leave even for a temporary engagement without serious risk.

My inability to attend involves a personal sorrow in that it deprives me of the only opportunity I shall probably ever have of paying a public tribute of affection and respect to the memory of one who, at a critical period of my life, rendered me a service which it would be the basest ingratitude to forget. It was not only the most important one ever rendered to me, but was one which changed the whole course of my life and became the stepping-stone to all I subsequently attained. It was performed, too, at a time when he was not a Member of the Senate, but an ordinary private citizen, and was itself a proof of the strong personal influence he held, independent of any official connection with the Government.

It can never be forgotten of Senator Chandler that while his political methods were sometimes criticized even by members of his own party, he was one of half a dozen men who saved this Union in the most perilous hour of its existence. Like most men of strong character, he was an ardent supporter of whatever he undertook to do, and knew no such thing as a feeble determination or a half-hearted support. He was masterful in his nature and a born leader of men. When the great work of his life had been finished and the Union restored, he was as wise in the steps taken by him to cement that restoration and preserve the national faith untarnished as he had been to suppress open opposition in the field. He was opposed to all forms of repudiation, and insisted upon the preservation of the national faith. He was steadfast with those who stood by us and relentless to those who opposed us. He was born for the age in which he lived, and passed away when the real work of his life had been accomplished.

Very truly, yours,

H. B. BROWN,
Ex-Justice Supreme Court United States.

In the absence of Mr. Justice Brown and at the unanimous request of the commission having this ceremony in charge, the statue will be accepted by Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, the ranking Republican Senator and the ranking legislator in both branches of Congress, a rugged, stalwart figure from the State where Chandler was born. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF SENATOR GALLINGER.

Senator GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman and Lieut. Gov. Ross, I esteem it a special privilege to be permitted to participate in the exercises of this day, and in behalf of the Government of the United States to accept from your great State the statue of the illustrious man whom Michigan so rightly and justly honors—Zachariah Chandler.

New Hampshire, the State that I in part represent in the Senate, gave to other States of the Union a galaxy of men scarcely equaled in the history of our country. That little State gave Daniel Webster and Henry Wilson to Massachusetts, Salmon P. Chase to Ohio, Horace Greeley, Charles A. Dana, and John A. Dix to New York, William Pitt Fessenden to Maine, James W. Grimes to Iowa, and Lewis Cass and Zachariah Chandler to Michigan. The statue of Lewis Cass, contributed to the Government by Michigan, stands conspicuously in this Hall, a place dedicated to great men, and now the effigy of Zachariah Chandler is appropriately to become Michigan's second contribution to this collection of the chosen representatives of the several States of the Union.

The real name of Mr. Chandler was Zacharias, which was afterwards changed to Zachariah, but during his entire life he was known familiarly as "Zach." In his later years, when his friends wished to speak affectionately of him, the designation applied to him was usually "Old Zach," which he seemed to look upon as a term of endearment.

New Hampshire, equally with Michigan, honors the memory of Zachariah Chandler. The little town of Bedford, where he first saw the light of day on December 10, 1813, is not unmindful of his achievements after he left the ancestral home in search of fame and fortune in what was then a western State, and the people of New Hampshire as a whole feel a justifiable pride in the great services he rendered the country at a time when patriotism was sorely needed and a high type of both physical and moral courage was essential in dealing with the problems of that day. So, New Hampshire on this occasion grasps the hand of Michigan in joint recognition of the virtues and abilities of a true American statesman—a man of rare powers of intellect, whose life was devoted to the advocacy of the principles and policies upon which our Government was founded and the perpetuity of which are essential to its future success.

The life of Zachariah Chandler is a peculiarly interesting and instructive one. Born on a farm, educated in the little brick schoolhouse of his native town, which I believe still stands, and in the village academies of Pembroke and Derry, without the advantages that a liberal education gives, he took up the work of life resolutely and hopefully. After leaving school he engaged in farm work. He next taught school a short time, and then entered a dry goods store as clerk in the city of Nashua, near his birthplace. At the age of 20 the eyes of the young man were turned westward, as the eyes of so many young men in the East were in those days, and he emigrated to Detroit, where he continued to reside until his death, in the year 1879, in his sixty-sixth year. He carried with him to the West the intellectual ability and strength of character that he inherited from his Scotch-Irish ancestors. He carried with him also the physical vigor that the ozone of the New Hampshire hills implants in the human body, and with this equipment, aided by the stimulating influences of western push and energy, it is no wonder that his career in life was a remarkable one.

Shortly after reaching Detroit he engaged in business, in which he made a great success. In 1851 he was elected mayor of Detroit, and in 1852 was nominated as the Whig candidate for governor and was defeated. He was prominent in the organization of the Republican Party in 1854. He served for a time as chairman of the Republican national committee, and was Secretary of the Interior under President Grant.

In addition to these honors he was four times elected to the United States Senate, his service in that body, which were of a most distinguished kind, covering a period of 19 years. He died a Senator.

On the occasion of his death expressions of sympathy and appreciation came from all quarters. His funeral was a notable affair, attended by the militia, by hundreds of men in professional and public life from all parts of the country, and by a vast concourse of his sorrowing fellow citizens. The Nation mourned the loss of a truly great man. The late James G. Blaine, in writing of his burial, said:

Thus was Zachariah Chandler buried. Living, he was honored. Dead, he was mourned. Though dead his labors and his example remain, and they form his fittest monument.

What greater tribute could be paid to any man than that? The country boy, born in the East, had achieved fame and power in a new field, and he died honored and mourned by all his countrymen. This statue can add nothing to his fame. It will stand here to be gazed on by his countrymen and by pilgrims from all lands, who will recognize in its strong and expressive features the likeness of a man whose intellectual powers, force of character, and integrity of life won for him universal respect and imperishable renown.

On behalf of the Government I accept the statue and beg to thank Michigan for this notable contribution to the National Hall of Fame. [Applause.]

Senator SMITH of Michigan. It would be a very easy matter in a gathering like this, composed of many soldiers and many citizens who knew Senator Chandler personally, to produce a symposium of eulogy almost without limit. I see before me many of his cotemporaries; but time will not permit, and the completeness of this service does not demand, that we prolong it further.

I am going to ask Dr. Couden, himself a soldier, who last saw the flag of his country upon the field of battle 50 years ago, to close the ceremony which he so appropriately opened with prayer.

CONCLUDING PRAYER.

Rev. Dr. Couden offered the following prayer:

And now, O God our heavenly Father, who hast watched over us in the past, and led us on step by step to larger and nobler life as individuals and as a people, let the spirit of Thy Son Jesus Christ come and dwell in our hearts, that we may go forth doing the work that Thou hast called us to do, honoring Thee, honoring our fellow men, and making for ourselves worthy characters that may reflect Thy glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it was my misfortune to be absent on the business of the Senate when the exercises attending the unveiling in this Capitol of the statue of Zachariah Chandler were held, and now, in moving the adoption of the resolution asking for the acceptance of that statue by Congress, I desire briefly to pay my humble tribute to the memory, life, and public services of one of Michigan's most distinguished sons. From the long list of her illustrious dead she has selected for places in our Valhalla of Fame two men who typify not alone the greatness of her great men of the past, but whose characters, statesmanship, and patriotism made them peers of any man our country has produced at any time.

Lewis Cass and Zachariah Chandler were contemporaries, representing the different political theories and policies of their time. Cass was a Democrat, Chandler a Republican. While differing in their political views, they were one in uncompromising honesty and lofty patriotism. Both represented their State in the Senate, but not at the same time, Chandler having succeeded Cass in this body, where the former served for more than a fifth of a century. Their honorable rivalry as leaders of their respective parties produced a standard of politics in Michigan justly famous for its strength and ability. "There were giants in those days." The honorable friction of strong, honest, big men results in the development of strength and character. The lives of Cass and Chandler did much to mold and shape the history of Michigan. How fitting it is that these two men who, during a portion of their lives, worked together, should be selected by the State they honored with such distinction as her contribution to the Nation's chamber of immortals. In yonder hall their marble statues stand, surrounded by those of Washington, Adams, Webster, Benton, Calhoun, Morton, Garfield, and a score of other illustrious Americans.

What a galaxy of symbolized greatness! If their immortal spirits could invest those marble shafts, a convocation of the greatest minds, the most eloquent orators, the most able statesmen ever gathered at one time and place in all the tide of time could there be held.

The character and services of Zachariah Chandler have been eloquently and faithfully told on another occasion. What was said there will be published for the benefit of those who are interested in them, so I shall not take the time of the Senate to repeat in a feeble manner what will appear in the published report.

The great characteristics of Zachariah Chandler were his unsullied honor, his uncompromising fidelity to principle, his absolute fearlessness in a cause which he believed to be just.

His public life and services were in a time which "tried men's souls."

He was a Republican of Republicans. He was at the birth of the Republican Party "Under the Oaks" at Jackson, Mich. He helped to shape its principles. He assisted in dedicating it to the cause of liberty. He directed as much as any other man its efforts to destroy African slavery. He was the unyielding enemy of treason and disunion. With merciless impartiality he flayed the secessionist, the northern copperhead, and the timid, time-serving Republican. He followed without the shadow of turning the direct path from offense to punishment.

His uncompromising force and energy made active and bitter enemies. No great man, fearless in effort and unyielding in determination, ever failed to make enemies, but of such men are made the leaders of principle, the avengers of wrong.

Chandler was the close friend and adviser of Abraham Lincoln. Upon him the President leaned for comfort and courage. His confidence in the Union cause never wavered, and when the clouds of the Civil War lowered darkest President Lincoln sent for Chandler, and immediately hope revived and courage was renewed.

Michigan has done well in embalming in enduring marble her distinguished son. In the Hall of Fame his effigy will be a decoration of honor to the Nation which he did so much to preserve.

I ask the Senate to accept from Michigan her statue of Zachariah Chandler. I ask for the adoption of the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

VOLUNTEER FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, 7, and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of any company, troop, or battery, or when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of each company, troop, or battery comprised in any battalion or regiment of the organized land militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, organized as prescribed by law and War Department regulations, shall volunteer and be accepted for service in the Volunteer Army as such company, troop, battery, battalion, or regiment, such organization may be received into the volunteer forces in advance of other organizations of the same arm or class from the same State, Territory, or District, and the officers in the organized land militia service with such organization may then, within the limits prescribed by law, be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of corresponding grades in the Volunteer Army and be assigned to the same grades in the said organization or elsewhere as the President may direct"; and the Senate agree to the same.

G. M. HITCHCOCK,
LUKE LEA,
H. A. DU PONT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES HAY,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

S. 656. An act granting to the trustees of the diocese of Montana of the Protestant Episcopal Church, for the benefit of Christ-Church-on-the-Hill, at Poplar, Mont., lots 5, 6, and 7, in block 30, town site of Poplar, State of Montana;

H. R. 13453. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; and

H. R. 15906. An act providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from officers and members of the Railway Employees' Department of the American Federation of Labor, in convention assembled at Kansas City, Mo., representing 350,000 railway employees, remonstrating against the conditions existing in the mining districts of Colorado, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have heretofore presented a large number of petitions in favor of the proposed constitutional amendment for the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, sale, and so forth, of intoxicating liquors. I now present a memorial from 859 citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment, which I ask may be referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE. I send to the desk a telegram which I ask may be read with the names attached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., April 23, 1914.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly urge avoidance of any steps involving war until whole complex Mexican situation can be examined by commission of inquiry that Congress and people may have full and accurate knowledge of facts. Further, that situation calls for immediate and express declaration by Congress that United States will in no event have any territory from Mexico by conquest.

JOHN D. LONG.
ALBERT E. PILLSBURY.
SAMUEL A. ELIOT.
CHARLES F. DOLE.
WILLIAM D. HOWELLS.
EDWIN D. MEAD.
JOHN GRAHAM BROOKS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for the maintenance of an assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. BRADLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES (S. DOC. NO. 472).

Mr. OWEN. I have received a letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a list of persons found to be apparently equitably entitled to enrollment in the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma. I ask that the letter and accompanying statement be printed as a public document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that action will be taken.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS, SPRINGFIELD, MO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3403) to abolish the office of receiver of public moneys at Springfield, Mo., and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 4, after "shall," to insert "10 days"; on page 1, in lines 4 and 5, to strike out "31st day of December, 1913" and insert "passage and approval of this act"; on page 2, line 5, after "regulation" to insert "Provided, That all the fees and commissions now allowed by law to both such register and such receiver shall, 10 days after the passage and approval of this act, be paid to and accounted for by such register in the same manner and in like amounts in which they are now required to be paid to and accounted for by such receiver, but the salary, fees, and commissions of such register shall not exceed $3,000 per annum"; to strike out all of section 2; on page 3, line 8, strike out "3" and insert "2"; on page 3, in lines 10 and 11, to strike out "on the 31st day of December, 1913," and insert "10 days from and after the approval of this act."

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have a letter from the chairman of the committee for the preservation of American rights in the Panama Canal. It is brief, and in my judgment a very excellent statement of some of the practical phases of that question. I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the letter presented by him may be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Chair kindly state what is the document that is being read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a letter presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], bearing upon the question of the repeal of tolls proposed to be laid on ships passing through the Panama Canal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I objected the other day, so far as individual objection can go, to arguments on this question being inserted in the RECORD. There is no limit to them, and there will hardly be a limit to those to be made by Senators on the floor, probably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will permit the Chair to state that the Senator from Washington asked unanimous consent that the letter be read. The request was put to the Senate, and no objection was interposed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was not in the Chamber at the time, and I have nothing more to say; but I give notice that I shall object to the reading of such documents every time I am here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not overlooked the attitude of the Senator from Connecticut. The Secretary will proceed with the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the letter.

[Letter withheld pending decision of question by Senate.]

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not know that I could lodge any protest against mere falsehood and illogical arguments, such as are contained in the instrument which has just been read from the desk, but I do most earnestly protest against reading into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any statement from any person that makes malignant charges against any Member of the Senate, such as are contained in this particular instrument.

I also protest against it because it falsely states the attitude of Members of the Senate. We have all of us received the circular letter which has been read into the RECORD. One very cursory glance at it will show to anyone who is acquainted with the truth how far the statements are from the truth.

I have noticed in all of the arguments which have been based upon statements made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that they have been exceedingly careful to quote only a portion of his very logical address. The Senator from Massachusetts took the position that, taking the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by itself, he could read into it, and he did read into it, a right upon our part to differentiate in favor of any and all of our vessels. They fail, however, and very carefully fail, to insert the other portion of his argument, in which he declared that it was his belief, and is his belief, that both of the parties to the contract understood that it gave us no such rights, and that it should be construed according to the understanding of the parties when they signed that agreement.

I think this explanation of the position of the Senator ought to be placed in the RECORD following the statement in the letter of his position in the argument he made before the Senate; but my objection and my protest now are against reading into the RECORD any such slurs as are made in the letter upon the character, honesty, and integrity of Senators who have seen fit to discuss this question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. In the first place, I will say that I would not have offered this letter to be read into the RECORD had I construed it in any sense as involving any slur, as the Senator says, upon any Senator. I do not believe that it does. I think that it is a legitimate discussion of the public views of public men upon a great public question.

Now, I want to ask the Senator to point out, if he will, the false statements which he says have been made in this document.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will point out one of them, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should prefer to have the Senator from North Dakota do so now.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not the instrument at hand now, and from merely hearing it read the Senator knows that it would be impossible to state the specific language. Perhaps, if I were going to quote the false statements, I would put a quotation mark at the beginning and at the end, and include it all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, that statement renders it unnecessary to discuss further the Senator's allusion, because it is so extreme that it carries its own refutation with it. I had supposed that when the Senator made the allegation that there were false statements in the letter, he had in mind what he was referring to and could point out some false statement of fact. The statement of a conclusion or of a deduction can not be characterized as a false statement; it may be an erroneous conclusion, but the Senator can not characterize it as a falsehood merely because he does not agree with it. I agree with the views, both as to the interests involved in this controversy and as to the effect of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which are contained in this letter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can very briefly state some of the false statements. In the very beginning of the letter, almost within the first sentence, is the false statement that the President has changed his position in now contending that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty bound us not to discriminate. Neither the President has changed his position, nor has anyone who supports the President changed his position in reference to that matter.

I could run through the letter if I cared to take up the time, and in every paragraph I could find some false statement. The Senator says a conclusion may be false without the statement being false; but both are erroneous here.

On the other proposition the Senator says that he did not understand that the letter made any improper insinuations or charges against any Senator. I read from the letter:

[Matter withheld pending decision of question by Senate.]

If that is not worse than a discourteous charge against a Member of this body, then I can not understand the import of the English language. I say to the Senator, candidly, that we ought to meet these arguments fairly and not merely by insinuation, and that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ought not to be the vehicle to carry to the public the spleen of everyone who desires to enter a protest against the position of any Senator in this body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this letter states that the greatest material interest in the United States is arrayed on the side of the "repealers," as it expresses it, and that that interest is the railroad interest. Does the Senator deny that statement? Are not the transcontinental railroads arrayed upon the side of the "repealers" upon this question?

Mr. McCUMBER. If they are, I have no communication to that effect and no means of knowing it. I assume that there are roads that would very naturally be interested in it, and I may as well assume also that the coastwise vessels are interested on the other side of the question; but the argument for us is not as to who is or who is not interested. I am speaking directly as to the improper charges that are contained in that letter, and I do not propose to go into the argument of the question now as to what class of people are interested on this or the other side of the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator has been so extreme in his statements that I want to comment upon them in a very few words. I see the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is not here; I wish that he were here; but I want to say that while I disclaim any either open or concealed reflection upon the motives of the Senator from New York, the Senator from New York has been the great leader of this fight, which I say is in the interest of the transcontinental railroads and of Great Britain. That is the statement of fact that is made in that letter. I do not interpret it as casting any reflection upon the Senator from New York.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have not agreed with the legal argument made by the Senator from New York with reference to the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but I have never for one moment doubted the entire good faith, honesty of purpose, and patriotism of the Senator from New York in taking the position which he did, and nobody who knows him could for one moment doubt the purity of the motives which actuate him; but I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to this language in this letter which, it seems to me, if he had read it with care and had considered the extent of its meaning, he would have refrained from presenting to the Senate.

The letter, upon page 3, says:

[Matter withheld, pending decision of question by Senate.]

And again, in the language to which the Senator from North Dakota has called attention, it is said:

[Matter withheld, pending decision of question by Senate.]

Mr. President, I undertake to say that that is language which a Senator standing upon the floor of the Senate would not be permitted to utter with reference to another Senator. That being so, it seems to me a Senator ought not to present a letter from a private citizen which makes those statements.

As a Member of this body, and desirous of maintaining its dignity, I protest against such documents being read into the RECORD, and I move to expunge the letter from the RECORD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to say that my interpretation of this letter is that it asserts that the railroad interests, which it denominates as a monopoly—and that is a very common opinion of the railroad interests; I think there is a common agreement and understanding between the transcontinental railroads of this country; there certainly is as to rates, and they have a monopoly—are simply following the leadership of the Senator from New York. I do not interpret the letter as meaning that the Senator from New York is in any sense a representative of those interests in this matter.

I think it is generally conceded that the speech of the Senator from New York upon this question reopened the matter, and the amount of money that has been used to circulate that speech by the Carnegie board has been the greatest factor in the propaganda upon the British and the railroad side of this question.

I think we can discuss those facts without impugning in any way the integrity of the motives of the distinguished Senator from New York. I disclaim any such reflection upon him, but the facts in the case are patent and obvious to everybody.

The Senator from North Dakota refers to the allegation in this letter that the President has changed his attitude as to the construction of the treaty. The fact that it is well known that he made a speech during the campaign in which he urged the exemption from tolls of coastwise traffic through the canal, and that since that time he has reversed his position upon the subject, is a sufficient answer to the Senator. I do not care to say anything further upon that subject.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the rule of the Senate provides that—

No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words, impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

In the letter from which the extract has been read repeatedly it is stated that the Senator from New York, in his speech favoring repeal, was leading the forces of monopoly. It does not make any matter how the Senator from Washington interprets it or how I interpret it. That is the statement. That statement would be out of order if made by any Senator on this floor in regard to another, and I hope it will be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. When a Senator offers a letter of that character is it not a part of his speech?

Mr. LODGE. It is not a speech at all.

Mr. WEST. I know; but is it not considered a part of his remarks?

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President; then it is out of order on that ground, but I think the most direct way is to expunge it from the RECORD.

Mr. WEST. In other words, does not a Senator assume the responsibility of the letter going into the RECORD and whatever it contains?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to say that the majority of the people whom I represent are in favor of exemption of tolls for coastwise shipping, yet I have waited for the evidence before deciding what I will do. I am entirely independent and free in the matter, and feel myself so, and stated in my campaign that I would be; that I would vote for what I thought was right, quite regardless of my future political fate or anybody's objections to my course.

In listening to this letter, however, I must say that it struck me that it is an indirect and unfair and insidious attack upon a Senator whom I may oppose in voting on this question, and I do not think it is proper. I think the Senator who puts it in the RECORD should assume the responsibility for the statement and come out and fight in the open. It seems to me this is an unfair way of "reaching the feelings," if you please, of an opponent, and I think it is not in order.

A short time ago I made some remarks, as Senators may remember, about certain documents being "doctored." They were ruled to be out of order, and I had to take my seat. Yet this is a more serious and insulting thing. It is an insult, and it is an indirect one, and it is put in the RECORD in such a way that the opponent can not defend himself. I do not like it. While I wish to say that perhaps the majority of the people whom I represent here are in sympathy with the stand taken by the Senator who has introduced the letter, I know they would prefer an open and a fair fight.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I entered the Chamber but a moment ago, and I do not know what is in the letter to which reference has been made, but enough has been said since I came in to give me the substance of the matter about which the discussion proceeds.

I think I ought to say, and I do say, to the Senate that I do not know how the people who own or manage the railroads of the country feel regarding the Panama Canal tolls; but I do know that I have never at any time received any communication, written or verbal, direct or indirect, regarding the tolls upon the Panama Canal, or any exemption or discrimination in those tolls, from anybody connected with the management of any railroad—never. I have no reason to suppose they are not perfectly indifferent on the subject. They may not be; I do not know; but they certainly have indicated to me no interest whatever in the subject.

Mr. President, I believe the course of conduct upon which our country has embarked, unless checked, would dishonor the name of the United States. I care nothing about the interests of England. They are trifling. The one great interest which looms large in my mind in respect of the discrimination as to tolls upon the Panama Canal is the absorbing interest of good faith and honor for our country.

It is because I believe that and feel it with all the depth and strength of my nature that I made the speech I made in January of last year, and that I shall continue, so long as there is a possibility of affecting the action of the United States, to maintain the position I took in that speech.

Sir, I have no wish that our country shall compromise a debt of honor. I do not wish the question settled except it be settled right, except it be settled in accordance with the high standard of good faith which ought to characterize the great American democracy, except it be settled in accordance with the convictions which are entertained and have been expressed to Congress by the present President of the United States, whom I honor for his courage and his response to the dictates of his own conscience.

Mr. President, there is a group of Americans most of whom entertain the same feeling that I entertain and that the President entertains upon this subject. Right or wrong—we may all be wrong or we may be right—we feel alike, we think alike upon this question. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has referred to that group. They have been brought together fortuitously to act as the trustees of a fund to be devoted to promoting the cause to which we all profess to be devoted—the cause of peace and good will throughout the world. Who are they? Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, the great leader of American educators; Joseph H. Choate, the acknowledged leader of the American bar and leader in all good causes of public spirit and philanthropy; Andrew D. White, the founder of Cornell University, historian, scholar, ambassador to Germany, first delegate of the United States to the first peace conference at The Hague; ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, former governor of Virginia; JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, Senator from Mississippi; JAMES L. SLAYDEN, Representative from Texas; Robert S. Brookings, of Missouri; WILLIAM M. HOWARD, of Georgia; Samuel Mather, of Ohio; and a dozen others of the same type of American citizenship.

Have we come to such a pass of official restriction upon American freedom that these men are to be criticized and condemned because, holding opinions and convictions upon a matter affecting the vital interests and the good name of their country, some of them put in writing and print a statement of their opinions and spread it broadcast among their countrymen?

Ah, Mr. President, it is the highest duty of the men who are qualified to be leaders of opinion to be not timid but brave in doing their part in the great public discussions on questions of governmental duty.

These men addressed their countrymen upon the issue of discrimination in tolls upon the canal because they believed it involved the honor and good name of their country. May the time never come when free American citizens shall be afraid to go to the country on such a question. I protest against that righteous action—righteous whether they were right or wrong; righteous because they were performing the high duty of American citizenship in a free Republic—being made the subject of criticism and condemnation in this body of representatives of a free democracy.

I spoke, sir, here with the convictions of a lifetime, which I believe to be sincere and patriotic. I spoke in accordance with the convictions of my life, and I wish the words I said might have been stronger and more compelling of opinion. But such as they were, I wish I could get them to the eyes of every American and carry them into the heart of every American. The Senator from Washington by no devious and side approach of condemnation can drive me off the field of my rights as an American and my duty as a Senator of the United States to say what I believe to be for the honor and the good name of the country we all love.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from New York necessarily assumes somewhat the position of a leader in any cause in which he interests himself. There is no man within my knowledge who has rendered more conspicuous services to his country than the Senator from New York. I remember most distinctly when we were involved in a war the extent of which at that time we could not estimate or the dangers into which it might involve this country, and after a long period of peace our Army proved to be ill prepared to perform the functions for which an army is maintained, the Senator from New York, through the wisdom of the President at that time, was selected for the great post of Secretary of War. I remember how he brought order out of chacs and made effective what was deficient and ineffective. He has rendered similar service in other great departments of the administration and similar service in this great legislative body.

Now, Mr. President, far be it from me to question the right which the Senator asserts with so much eloquence, the right of the Senator from New York to take whatever position he may see fit to take upon this or any other question which comes within the field of legislative action. But while he asserts the right to take the position which he sees fit to take, I assert the right to take the position which I see fit to take and to criticize, as I claim it, not only on my own behalf but on behalf of every free citizen of this Republic, and to oppose, if we see fit, the great influence which comes from the distinguished services and from the great ability of the Senator from New York.

It is a new doctrine, if I understand aright the position of the Senator from New York, that every citizen of this country is estopped from criticizing the membership of the Carnegie peace board, or whatever the title of it may be, for the policies which they propose and are attempting to put into effect through the money power of enormous wealth which has been sucked, I will say, from the substance of the American people upon what is equivalent to a watered-stock mortgage upon their industries.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WEST. I should like to interrupt the Senator for a moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Have there not been means employed, too, by those opposed to the bill to influence the Senate in its action?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There have been means employed, I admit, but there have been no improper means employed. There has been no great endowment or anything like that of Mr. Carnegie ranged upon this side of the question that I know of.

Mr. WEST. Well, I will ask the question plainer, then: Has there not been money spent to get the literature before the people? Did not the sending out of wires broadcast over the country require the expenditure of money, and has not that been done by the opposition to the bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose, Mr. President, that individual citizens and organizations here and there throughout the country who are interested in this matter have spent their own money to present their views in sending a few telegrams and letters. There has been no such propaganda as has been carried on by the $10,000,000 endowment of the Carnegie peace board.

The Senator from New York gives the names of the distinguished gentlemen who compose the executive committee of this board, and they are distinguished, and I have the highest respect for them all. But under whose patronage are they operating? Under the patronage of Andrew Carnegie. As I understand Mr. Carnegie—I have no prejudice against him at all—he is more of a British subject than he is an American citizen in his sympathies. I think he is a laird or landowner in some Scotch county, and takes great pride in the fact and spends a great deal of his time there. I do not regard Andrew Carnegie as a typical American citizen or as imbued with American traditions or actuated by American ideals. I do understand that the campaign which this board is carrying on is in furtherance of the views of Andrew Carnegie in regard to the Panama Canal tolls and in regard to peace.

As the Senator from New York has said, we are all advocates of peace. What has Mr. Carnegie done for peace? He spent a great deal of money to promote his views ostensibly for peace; but, as a matter of fact, his endowment campaign which he has carried on in behalf of the British contention in this question has done more to put in the breasts of Americans a patriotic resentment against foreign interference in what they consider their own sovereignty than any other influence which has been exerted in a generation. Instead of bringing these two great nations together in harmony and peace and genuine friendship it has carried them apart, and has laid the ground for future differences which may lead to untold troubles.

I believe that this great accumulation of treaties which have been promoted at so much expense and so much persistence by Mr. Carnegie instead of being, as they are denominated, peace treaties, might be called subjects for controversy and difference. Instead of instruments of peace these so-called treaties bind this Government to enter into arbitration about unknown subjects which are held in the womb of the future, and which, if the interests and good sense of our people when they arrive refuse to arbitrate, put us in a position which we are charged with now in this Panama tolls question of repudiating our obligations when we do not repudiate them at all.

The Carnegie Peace Board is not accomplishing its professed object. I believe that it, and likewise the Rockefeller Endowment, just as was disclosed by a document in this RECORD here the other day, which has under its tutelage and is paying the salary of some 600 employees of the United States Government, are an evil influence; that they are perverting the great resources that have been accumulated in ways which have been criticized here and elsewhere from the American people to put into our Government, into our laws, into our international relations not American views but the views of Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. President, so far as this letter is concerned, when I introduced it, as I have stated, I had no intention of introducing any paper which cast any reflection upon any member of this body, and I do not think it was the intention of the writer of this letter. I think it is legitimate for men to use strong expressions, if they see fit to do so, which do not impute improper motives to others. If the expressions which have been referred to are construed as they seem to be construed, I do not desire to leave them in the RECORD. So I will ask leave, Mr. President, to excerpt from this letter the expressions which have been objected to.

Mr. LODGE. I object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So do I.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Objection is made, and the question before us, I understand, is the motion of the Senator from Utah to expunge the letter from the RECORD. I confess that I do not want to vote personally upon that matter. May I be allowed to suggest to the Senator that instead of asking leave to withdraw a portion of the letter he ask leave to withdraw the entire letter from the RECORD?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the letter is in the RECORD now. It has been read.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire not to vote upon the motion. I do not want the letter to appear in the RECORD, because I consider it to be a reflection upon a Member of this body. I do not want it directly expunged from the RECORD, because I do not want that action to reflect upon another Member of this body, who upon the floor has declaimed any intention of disrespect. I think that is a reasonable and a just and a fair disposition of the whole matter. The Senator from Washington has said to the Senate that he intended by the introduction of the letter no disrespect to any Member of this body. Some think there is, as a matter of fact, disrespect. I believe that the best way out of the whole situation is that the letter be withdrawn. It effects the same purpose exactly, and in that way reflects upon no Member of the body connected with the transaction.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I agree fully that it is not proper to read into the RECORD an attack upon a Member of this body; and yet if we were as punctilious on all occasions as we are invoked to be this morning page after page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this very morning would be expunged. I leave Senators individually to examine the RECORD to justify my suggestion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire pardon an interruption one moment that I may read one of the rules?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find, on page 20, Rule XXI, which is as follows:

> Any motion or resolution may be withdrawn or modified by the mover at any time before a decision, amendment, or ordering of the yeas and nays, except a motion to reconsider, which shall not be withdrawn without leave.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That does not apply.

Mr. SMOOT. That does not apply to this matter.

Mr. JAMES. It does not apply.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this discussion—and I had not intended to participate in it, and would not had it not been for some words that fell from the lips of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]—in this discussion I have been very much surprised to have it said that the President of the United States has not changed his position on the matter of tolls exemption for coastwise vessels.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair inquire, has the Senator from Washington yielded the floor?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to retain the floor. I yielded temporarily to the Senator from New Hampshire. I have no desire to take the Senator from New Hampshire off the floor at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair merely wants to know the status of Senators in this debate. Anything is agreeable to the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to take many minutes of the time of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. After the Senator concludes I wish to make a further statement and possibly a request in regard to the letter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have tried to be a careful student of this question, and it is astounding to me that any Senator, or anyone outside of the Senate, should say that there has not been a change of view both on the part of the President of the United States and on the part of many other men in public life. I do not criticize that, but it is a fact, and it is idle to deny that it is not a fact.

Mr. President, what I particularly desire to say, and I shall say it in a very few words, is that the Senator from New York on a previous occasion, as on this occasion, has held up to the country the idea that national honor can only be subserved by the repeal of the tolls clause of the Panama Canal act. Mr. President, some of us are just as sensitive upon this question of national honor as is the Senator from New York. Some of us take exception to that view and hold that we are subserving the national honor to a greater extent by standing by what we conceive to be the rights of the American people as against the protests from Great Britain by resisting the proposition to repeal the tolls clause of the Panama Canal act.

I find no fault with what the Senator from New York has done or said; I find no fault with any Senator for differing from the views I hold; but I do find fault with any suggestion that national honor can only be upheld and promoted by taking a different view from what we took when we passed the Panama Canal act, which was approved by the present President.

I do not know, Mr. President, that I care to find fault with Mr. Carnegie for his $25,000,000 income pouring into his pockets every year being used to finance a propaganda to spread the views that he and the Senator from New York hold on this question, but I do think it is an unfortunate circumstance, if the charge that has been made in high quarters is true, that the arguments and speeches that have been made for a repeal of the tolls clause of the Panama Canal act have been scattered broadcast throughout Great Britain as well as throughout the United States. If that be true, Mr. President, as I believe it to be true, it is a very unfortunate circumstance indeed.

As to the question of national honor, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is just as sensitive on that point as can be the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] or any other Member of this body. I was guided to a very considerable extent on a former occasion by the views expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts as to our right to give exemption to our coastwise ships through the Panama Canal. True, the Senator from Massachusetts then, almost two years ago, as I remember it, voted his convictions, that while we could legally exempt our coastwise shipping, it is not good policy to do it, so that the question of national honor does not apply to those of us who support the free-tolls proposition.

Mr. President, what did the Senator from Massachusetts say on the 17th day of July, 1912? After reciting the fact that he was in London when the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was written, that he had intimate familiarity with its terms, and with its purposes no doubt, a treaty that he reported to the Senate, the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

That was the view of the Senator from Massachusetts in 1912. He has repeated it in a recent speech of great power and influence. In that same speech in 1912 the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> While I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, there is one other thing I should like to say. I said in my remarks a few days ago that my personal view was that we had the right to exempt American vessels from tolls. I did not go into the matter. I took a somewhat active part in the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as they are called. I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * * I had that same view in regard to this treaty. I was familiar with the work that was done upon it in London at the time when it was concluded there and finally agreed to, and I was very familiar with it here. Although, as the Senator from Georgia correctly said, the question was not raised at that time, I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing the tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction.

Mr. President, when it comes to a question of honor, if that is to be the issue, I submit that when the Senator from Massachusetts announced to the Senate in July, 1912, and has repeated it, that under a treaty that he himself reported to the Senate, with the construction of which he became familiar while in London, those of us who hold that view are just as much entitled to be considered as protecting the honor of the United States as are the Senators who take the opposite view.

I regret, Mr. President, that heretofore, as now, the integrity and the honor of those of us who differ from the great Senator from New York have been by implication called in question before the American people.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only want to say one thing to the Senator from New Hampshire. Of course I realize that those who differ from me in my view of what it is proper to do in regard to the Panama Canal tolls are just as sensitive to the honor of the country and just as patriotic and sincere as am I. I never questioned that for a moment.

The point here, it seems to me—and I will ask the Senator if he does not think so?—is a somewhat narrower one. Here is an imputation of motive in this letter that has been read into the RECORD as to those who favor repeal. I should regard it as utterly out of order and against the rules of the Senate to have a letter read here saying that those who favor repeal are doing so because they led the ship combine. I should think it was an outrageous thing to do, and such a letter should be expunged from the RECORD. Here is a proposition read into the RECORD that one of the distinguished supporters of the repeal is representing the monopolists. I think both would be equally improper. That is the only question I see here.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts on the particular point he has raised. On the other hand, the truth is that the charge has been openly made, and it can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that some of us are promoting the interests of a ship combine; but I care nothing about that. I substantially agree with the Senator from Massachusetts as to the propriety of printing the letter in full. I have taken the liberty to suggest to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] that perhaps he ought to withdraw the entire letter from the RECORD, or at least modify it by striking out the objectionable passages; but whatever may be done in that respect I want to repeat that, inasmuch as this question of honor has again been raised in the Senate, it is proper that some of us who differ from the distinguished Senator from New York and others, should put into the RECORD the statement that we are quite as sensitive to the matter of national honor as are those who take the view that the toll exemption in the Panama Canal act should be repealed.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from New York proceeds, he will permit the Chair to get the record straight. At the time the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] made a motion to strike the communication from the RECORD, he did not have the floor for that purpose, but was interrupting the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. Does the Senator from Utah desire to make that motion now?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do desire to make the motion. I prefer, however, that the Senator from Washington should see his way clear to withdraw the letter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I notice the Senator from New York has risen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will be recognized after this matter is disposed of. Does the Senator from Utah renew his motion to strike the letter from the RECORD?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I rise merely to say that I hope the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] does not think that I intended to impugn the motives or the good faith or the high-mindedness of anyone who differs from me upon this subject. I recognize in the fullest degree the right of differing opinions and the purity of motives and the high sense of honor of those who take the other view. It is as I believe, as I see it, as I think that I speak, and I must leave the Senator from New Hampshire to follow the dictates of his own judgment, as I must follow mine. I should protest as earnestly against any imputation upon the motives of those who differ with me upon this question as I protest against imputations upon my motives.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] ought to be permitted to take from this letter such portions of it as are objectionable, and that we permit the other portions of it to remain. None of us want to see incorporated in the RECORD anything which will impugn the motives of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] or those of any other Senator upon this floor. The Senator from Washington offers to take from the letter any such statement that covers what might be regarded as an assailment of the character or the motives of the Senator from New York; but, Mr. President, behind this proposition is the right of the American citizen to present his views to the Congress of the United States in the form of petition. This is the only way that he has a right to present them; and when the letter is stripped of the things that it ought not to contain and there are no personal references in it, we ought not to take the step of denying a citizen the right to interpose his views and have them in the RECORD. If the Senator from Washington proposes to strip the letter of those things which are objectionable, so far as I am concerned I shall resist to the last the taking of this letter out of the RECORD.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. Does he interpret the right of petition as giving the privilege to a person who writes a communication and sends it here to have it printed in the RECORD? Must every communication, however abusive it may be, carry the right to be published in this official or semiofficial publication?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if a citizen of the United States addresses his Senator in the nature of a petition upon a subject in which he is deeply interested, and desires his communication printed in the RECORD under the auspices of a Senator, he has a right to have it done. We have been following that rule ever since I have been here, for the last seven years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. When a Senator rises under the call for petitions, and presents telegrams, letters, and so forth, they are regarded under the rule as petitions from citizens. We have been following that rule; and I am not willing in this instance that any other rule or any other interpretation of the rule shall be put upon this matter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I am just as anxious that all personalities be eliminated here as is anyone else; but I do not propose for a moment to consent to the proposition that men shall not have their views presented here by their Senators.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho think that the right of petition includes the right of a citizen to send to this body a petition couched in such terms that it can only be construed as an insult or a reflection upon the integrity of a Senator?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Utah might have saved himself the necessity of asking that question by having given heed to what I said. I said that the Senator from Washington had proposed to strip the letter of all offensive matter, and that when it is not in an offensive form it becomes such a petition as we ought to receive.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, Mr. President, does the Senator think that this body ought to take the blue pencil and edit the petitions that are sent here by striking out offensive matter, or does he not think that the dignity of the Senate demands that, when such a communication as that is sent to this body, it should be rejected altogether?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the dignity of the Senate ought not to be so supersensitive as to preclude citizens of the United States from expressing their views upon important subjects.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if I may be indulged for just a word, I think the right of petition is not a right that is granted by the Constitution at all. The Senator will seek in vain in the Constitution to find any such provision. The constitutional provision is that the right of the people "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances" shall not be abridged, recognizing a preexisting right upon the part of the citizen, and I never have understood that the preexisting right of petition included any right to send to this body or to any other legislative body a petition which insulted the body or insulted a Member of it; and I undertake to say that, so far as I am concerned, I would not consent to the Senate of the United States editing a document of that character by striking out of it such parts as were insulting and permitting the remainder of it to go into the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has been done several times.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the Senator from Idaho misjudges the situation in some respects. This is not a petition to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I regard it as such.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will yield to me, I will be glad to proceed.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As I understand the situation, it is a letter addressed to the Senator from Washington. The Senator from Washington has not presented it as a petition to the Senate of the United States, because if he had done so he would not have asked unanimous consent to have it recorded. The Senator from Washington asked unanimous consent that this letter might be read and placed in the RECORD, not at all in the sense of a petition, but as giving the views of one of his constituents upon a matter of public concern. There are many of us who, had we supposed the letter contained the language it does, would have objected to giving that unanimous consent.

My objection to the letter lies to the whole letter, to the whole tone of the letter, and therefore I made free to suggest to the Senator from Washington that to let us all out of an unpleasant situation the letter be withdrawn, and in that way no reflection would be cast upon anybody.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when the offensive matter is taken out of the letter neither the Senator from New York nor his friends nor anyone else can object to it for a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the offensive matter had been taken out before the letter was presented, that might have been true, but the whole tone of the letter, the whole subject matter, is offensive to some Members of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. When reference is made to the subject of offensiveness, Mr. President, the campaign which has been carried on by those who are in favor of the repeal of the Panama Canal exemption clause has been quite as offensive as anything found in this letter.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will yield to me just for a moment, I want him to understand that in many respects with the substantive view of the letter I am in thorough accord, and I believe that the policy advocated by the letter is the correct one.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I received a copy of this letter and I read it. There are portions of the letter which did not appeal to me as being either argumentative or at all appealing as to the justice of the position the writer takes; but there are statements and arguments in the letter to which no one can take exception, and which present in a very forceful way the views of those who are against the repeal of the exemption clause.

We have been following the rule here ever since this question came up of introducing this and that matter, this telegram and that letter upon this subject; and if this letter is stripped of its offensive matter, why should we discriminate? You may, of course, say that technically it is not a petition; but if you go back to the days of John Quincy Adams, when he made his fight for the right of petition in the House of Representatives, you will find that he contended that if a communication came to him from the people, however unfortunately it might be expressed or whatever lack of form it might disclose, it was their conception of the manner of exercising that right under the Constitution and of expressing their views upon the question, and that he proposed to have it presented to the Congress of the United States, and he had it presented to the Congress of the United States. That question was all fought out.

Now, let us not be so supersensitive as to preclude that which disagrees with our views while we are anxious to have in the RECORD that which agrees with them. So long as it is an argument, if we can not meet it by counterargument, let us take the consequences.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there was some statement made by the Senator from New York as to a "side approach" by me in raising this question and of attacking Senators "in devious ways." I overlooked the matter at the time I replied to the Senator's statement, but I think that I ought to call attention to the fact that it is perfectly obvious that there has been nothing done here which is subject to that interpretation. This letter was presented. I am perfectly frank to say that there is some language in it, which my attention has been called to, that I would not have presented had my attention been particularly called to it before I presented the letter. I have offered to eliminate that language; but with or without that language, it is entirely unjustified on the part of the Senator from New York to refer to it as a "side approach." It is a perfectly direct presentation of the matter; and the statements of fact contained in this letter, leaving out of it all personal references to Senators, some of which have been disputed, I believe to be sound.

Reference has been made here to the right of Senators and the right of the President of the United States to change their minds. That is the right of every man. Nobody is questioning it. Yet we seem to be in the position here this morning of being criticized as doing something improper if we call attention to the fact that the President has changed his mind. We have come to a new pass, if that is the rule of propriety or the rule of ethics in the Senate. The statement is even made that the President has not changed his mind and has not reversed his position upon this proposition.

Mr. President, the situation is very much like that when, once before, a Democratic President went into office after a campaign in which he had pledged the American people to protect the sovereignty of the United States in a great area of disputed territory; and yet the first thing President James K. Polk did when he was inaugurated into office was to repudiate the platform of his party and the campaign cry of "Fifty-four forty or fight"; and we have to-day on our northwestern border 380,000 square miles of territory, full of the richest natural resources, which bears in its hybrid name, "British Columbia," the story of the repudiation of a campaign pledge by a great party which was given control of the Government upon the strength of it. Now, are we to be told that we can not call attention to these things; that we can not present here a letter from a citizen, in which he asserts that the President of the United States has reversed his position, without being accused of doing something improper?

Why, what is this campaign? To deny to the United States, the proprietor and builder of the Panama Canal, the privilege of passing its own ships through it under such terms and conditions as our domestic policy may warrant; and yet we are told that the administration has negotiated a treaty with Colombia in which there is given to her the same right which the friends and advocates of this repeal deny to the United States itself.

What has Great Britain to do with the Panama Canal? They say it has rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Panama Canal was, in large part, constructed before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was thought of. They say that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty interferes with the free action of the United States with reference to this canal. What does article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provide? It provides that if there shall be constructed not only a canal but a railroad across the Isthmus—and none but Nicaragua was at that time contemplated—Great Britain and the United States will do—what? Not that they will share it equally; not that they will give the same rights to one as to the other in that railroad or in that canal; but that they will come together and make a treaty with reference to it.

If we are to carry out the provisions of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which, it is said, are perpetuated by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, then it still remains for the United States and for Great Britain to come together, and, upon the conditions and the circumstances which apply to the two countries at Panama, to make a just agreement in regard to it. My position is that there is no basis of negotiation or subject of joint controversy between the United States and Great Britain with reference to the Panama Canal.

The railroad which is referred to in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was constructed and in operation and doing business and carrying domestic commerce across the Isthmus of Panama for many years before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated. Can it be said that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty applied to that railroad, built by an American company, then acquired by a French company, and then bought by the United States from its then owners?

What did we buy from the French Panama Co. at the Isthmus of Panama for which we paid $40,000,000? We bought a canal partly constructed. We bought a privilege of completing it, which was still in existence. We bought a railroad which, upon like terms as the canal, was subject to the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Yet, in spite of those palpable circumstances, those who are attempting to preserve the rights which we have purchased, those which have ripened by the completion of this great work, by the expenditure of vast sums of money, by the application to it of the skill and science and capacity of this great Nation, are impugning, it is said, the honor of the United States.

There is abroad in the land, and obvious at every turn in this discussion, the evidences of the effect of money upon our ethics and upon our morals. What is proposed to be done? The United States of Colombia, they say, are unfriendly to us. How do we propose to make them friendly? Why, by buying their friendship; by paying them $25,000,000 as a salve for their wounded feelings. Great Britain, they say, feels that we have not been punctilious in observing our international obligations when we have settled this question by the enactment of a statute, after a full discussion and after a presidential campaign conducted upon it. How is it proposed that we shall restore the standing of the United States in the estimation of Great Britain? Why, by turning over to Great Britain our rights without questioning whether they are our rights or not.

Mr. President and Senators, I doubt very much whether we can succeed in restoring the respect of the world for the United States, if we have lost it, by any such means. The way to get and retain the respect of foreign nations is by retaining our self-respect. It is by the use of the power of the Government of the United States to its full extent, against whatever power may be asserted against it, to preserve the undisputed rights of the United States. When we do that we will not only preserve our own self-respect, but we will preserve the respect and with it obtain the good will of every respectable foreign country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have reread the letter very carefully. To me it seems to be couched generally in an offensive tone toward all of those who differ with the view taken by the writer; and it also seems to impute to all of us who take a view different than that a motive that is not in the light in which we desire to be placed. Only a very few minutes remain before the unfinished business will be laid before us; and I desire to ask the Senator, after this discussion, if he is now willing to ask that the letter be withdrawn for the reasons that have been urged against it, without questioning at all the motives of the Senator who introduced it. I should like to see it go out before we reach the unfinished business, because if the consideration of that goes on the letter would remain in the RECORD and be printed, unless the unfinished business should be laid aside to accommodate it. I thought, from what has been said, that the Senator himself was quite willing to do that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not like to be precluded from the opportunity, and what has been regarded as the privilege, of presenting the views of the public upon this question by having them printed in the RECORD. Whatever may have been said as to the original form of the letter, if it is edited by excerpting from it any language which is deemed by any Senator to be personally offensive, I scarcely see how any part of it which merely deals with the subject matter can be offensive; and I therefore think the remainder of it ought to be allowed to be printed. I should like to dispose of it upon that basis.

Mr. McCUMBER. That could hardly be done at this time. The Senator at any future time, or even to-morrow, if he will withdraw it to-day, could then ask to put in such portions as he thinks would not be objectionable to the rule and which he thinks proper to have published in the RECORD. I am asking him if he can not withdraw it, at least for to-day, and then, when he has had time to read the matter over more thoroughly, present such portions as he thinks ought to go in.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much afraid that if that course is adopted, in view of some feeling that has been displayed, objection would be made to printing any portion of the letter on to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so, Mr. President. I think that is, no doubt, true. I do not think any of this letter ought to be put in the RECORD now, and I hope the Senator will either withdraw it all or we will strike out all of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that is the attitude of the Senator from Georgia; and I desire to say, in view of that—disclaiming, as I have done heretofore, any semblance of a desire to reflect upon the motives of any Senator, and I think my brief record in the Senate will bear me out in that statement—that I do propose, especially in view of what has been said upon this general controversy, to put into the RECORD the greater portion of this letter, which is a perfectly legitimate argument upon this great question which is before the American people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I recall very distinctly that on more than one occasion during my service in the Senate communications submitted to the Senate have had certain paragraphs eliminated from them by consent, and I really think that would be the best way to solve this problem. If this letter should be stricken out—and it probably can not happen before 2 o'clock—the Senator could read into the RECORD to-morrow the unobjectionable parts of it, and hence those parts would get into the RECORD anyway. So if the Senator were permitted to strike from the letter the parts which I think have been properly objected to, I think that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have great respect and the most friendly feeling for the Senator from New Hampshire and for his opinions about these matters, and also for the Senator from Wyoming; but in view of what has been said upon both sides of this question, it seems to me there is a mere punctilio as to the disposition that shall be made of the balance of the letter. I am perfectly willing to submit it to any Senator who feels that he is affronted by anything in it, and allow him to exclude from it whatever he thinks proper; but in view of the issue which has been made that we ought to dispose of the matter to-day, I do not care to see printed at all the part which is objected to; and I have understood that at any time after a matter is presented—at least, it has been the practice—the Senator presenting it has the privilege of taking out of it such parts as he sees fit.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he has made a formal request that the parts that are personal to any Member of this body shall be stricken from the letter, and that the remainder shall be printed? Has the Senator made that request?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I made it. If it was not sufficiently formal, I make it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington makes the request that certain parts of the communication which he has heretofore sent to the desk may be stricken out.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask who is to be the censor as to what is objectionable? I wish to say, for my part, that I believe this is a perfectly legitimate and proper publication. I need not say again that I am utterly opposed to the repeal of the exemption from tolls and will vote against it.

I have read the Bainbridge Colby letter. On a number of occasions he has addressed large audiences in the State of New Jersey, and very recently one at which a petition was most numerously signed, which I had the honor to present to this body, and which bore as well the signatures of very many other citizens of New Jersey.

God knows I have no personal spite or malice against the Senator from New York, but he has been in an unfortunate muddle and in unfortunate company with this band of—well, I will not say just what I would like to say. [Laughter.] While we wish to defer to his distinguished position and the distinguished State he represents, I feel that there is no reason in the world why the whole truth in this matter should be shut from the ear and the eye of the public.

I should like to know who is to be the censor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from New Jersey that perhaps he well remembers when the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] had a letter read at the desk, and certain portions of that letter were objected to because they referred to certain Senators in this body. He then asked unanimous consent that the parts of the letter that were objectionable should be stricken out; and it was left to the Senator from South Carolina and the Senators to whom offensive reference was made to agree upon what parts were to be stricken out. I think that would be a very proper course to be followed in this case.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If that course should be pursued, I will not say that I will object; but I trust in view of the widespread sentiment that exists in opposition to the measure the parties who may act as censors will be wisely circumspect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair will make an announcement. The Chair is dissatisfied with his service here, principally because he has not been able to devise a remedy for the wide latitude of debate in the Senate. In practice many times such a debate as that now going on has been held to be out of order, because Rule VII provides that—

> Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate.

But now the debate can not be recalled. The debate is an interesting one and relates to a great question, and the Chair did not feel like interposing an objection to its continuation. Even now the Chair is in doubt as to whether this is a privileged question. A motion has been made to strike out of the RECORD the disputed matter as one which reflects on Senators. It may, however, be very easily disposed of by regarding as something in the nature of a privileged question the motion made by the Senator from Utah to strike it out of the RECORD because it reflects upon Senators. The necessity for deciding this particular question now may be obviated by informally laying aside the unfinished business and by permitting the motion of the Senator from Utah to be finally disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let it be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply desire to say that it is the consensus of opinion of Senators around me that the unfinished business should be laid aside that we may dispose of the pending matter .

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has already been done.

Mr. JONES. I beg pardon. If it requires unanimous consent to lay the unfinished business aside, I shall object.

Mr. LODGE. I move to lay the unfinished business aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the unfinished business be laid aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts not to make that motion, because I have no doubt that the motion to lay it aside would carry, and therefore it might change the position it now holds. I hope, therefore, that the Senator from Washington will withdraw his objection. If it is removed from its place and we should adjourn without getting back to it to-day, it would be displaced.

Mr. JONES. I want to keep the Senator's bill in its position before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am satisfied the Senate wants to dispose of the pending matter now, and I am certain that they would vote in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts. I hope the Senator will not put the unfinished business in that position but will withdraw his objection. I appreciate the Senator's kindness and good wishes in the matter.

Mr. JONES. Of course, if the Senator in charge of the bill thinks it would embarrass the bill, I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington withdraw his objection?

Mr. JONES. I will withdraw my objection under those circumstances. I am very much interested in the bill the Senator from North Dakota has in charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is obviated by the announcement of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, nobody is fooling anybody else by this debate. The purpose of the reading into the RECORD of this paper and the purpose of the debate are all perfectly palpable to everybody possessed of common sense. "Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart" are after the President of the United States as hard as they can bark, and they are not doing him much harm. It is pretty much the same old pack that were after him to defeat him for the nomination, and later on to defeat him for election. He wills and selects his ground tolerably well. What he has said to the American people has rung forth in very clear tones, and they have not misunderstood his words, nor his intention, nor his purpose, nor his spirit, nor his patriotism.

During this debate he has been called "cowardly"; he has been called "pusillanimous"; he has been said to be "unpatriotic"; he has been said to be "anti-American"; he has been said to be "pro-British." When I say "during this debate," I do not mean the debate this morning; I mean the debate as it has taken place in the Senate and outside of the Senate, in the newspapers by interviews with Senators, since the debate began. I have before me now an edition of the Washington Post containing a long statement of one of the Senators in which the President is accused of being all these things, and in addition to that, is accused of being just as mean as if he had committed petty larceny, on the ground that in the pledge of the platform he worked to get into office and then afterwards, not living up to it, repudiated his pledge, and that this amounts to petty larceny, or grand larceny, or something of that sort.

Now, you are not going to change the character of this debate by saying things of that kind. This debate will come down after a while to where the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] fixed it, What was the understanding of the high contracting parties at the time they entered into a solemn international agreement? Not what was his interpretation, not what was mine, not what is the interpretation of the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Michigan, but what was at that time the understanding of the parties themselves when they made the agreement. And then, secondary to that, the American people are going to insist that whatever that coming together of minds was it shall be carried out, regardless of any possible legal quibble as to an interpretation of the words as finally adopted. The President of the United States will stand just as clean in honer, just as clean in patriotism, just as clean in Americanism, as any President of the United States who ever occupied the White House.

I notice here an article, beginning "Brink of defeat and disaster," the intent of which is to scare Democrats to death, and then the fact is mentioned that Senators ROOT and LODGE, although Republicans, are on the President's side and the question is asked whether the Democrats are going to follow them or not. No; they are following us. They are following the President. They are following him because he is right. They are following him because his arguments are unanswerable.

Now, there is no use talking about whether a little stuff put in the RECORD this morning is insulting or not. That has not been half as insulting as a great many other things that have been said. I am not any respector of persons or of public officials. I would just as soon insult the President of the United States as a policeman or a constable or anybody else if I thought he needed and deserved insult. I am no respector of anything of that official sort; but in this particular case this particular President has deserved no insult, and the American people will not put up with any to him. He is not pusillanimous. His policy is not cowardly. His policy is not un-American. It is not pro-British. He is representing the very highest and the very best spirit of Americanism in every step which he has taken, and the hounds can not bark him down, because the real kennel in this country is the American people, and they are not barking him down. He stands here representing an idea, and not only an idea but an ideal, and not only an ideal but the American ideal, and representing it he is going to stand acquitted before the American people in all that thus far he has said and done. The men who imagine that they have invited themselves to an ample field of cheap vote-getting in denouncing him will find themselves mistaken. From Maine to San Diego and from Portland to the southern parts of Florida they will find themselves mistaken.

Every sort of attack has been made upon him. He has been called "cowardly," "pusillanimous," "un-American," "unpatriotic," and "pro-British," and accused of surrendering to the dictates of a foreign power, and all that; and, furthermore, those who have stood by him have been called "sycophantic followers." I find that also in the public press coming from a Senator. When did we become sycophantic? When did any of us become cowardly? When did any of us become pusillanimous? When amongst gentlemen ever in the history of the world was it counted to be cowardly and pusillanimous to give way when you concluded you were wrong, if you were wrong?

Mr. Choate, who negotiated that treaty, says it was his understanding that there must be no discrimination against foreign ships. The gentleman across the border with whom he negotiated it says that that was his understanding. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] tells us that Secretary Hay told him that that was his understanding.

Now, suppose I enter into a contract with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is now doing me the honor of listening, and suppose that after he and I have an understanding and a coming together of mind I afterwards go and say, notwithstanding this coming together of mind, some particular language is capable of another interpretation, and I shall carry it into court and have it interpreted there, would that be square? Would that be honest? Would that be right? Would the Senator from Iowa have any respect for me after I had done it?

I voted when this question was up before for this exemption of tolls to our coastwise shipping. I voted for it because from a study of the language of the treaty I thought that I had the legal power and right to do it, and I still think that; but when I find that the coming together of minds was upon a different plane, that the understanding was different, and when I find, moreover that the civilized world differs with me about that interpretation of a treaty, then I plant myself as a Democrat very proudly by the side of the Senator from Massachusetts, Republican as he is.

I am not at all afraid that the Democratic President of the Democratic Party will go down before this sort of an assault. It will take something better than this to bury the President or the party, something better than the plutocratic newspapers of the United States, who for four or five weeks have nothing in their editorial columns except attacks upon the President and upon those of us who support him.

Now, one other word. I am a member of the Carnegie Endowment. Until I was appointed a member of it I had never seen Mr. Carnegie in my life and had never exchanged one word with him. I was appointed, I suppose, because I am a "peace fanatic." I proudly am. "My passion is peace." I do not believe in any sort of war in the world except private war as between me and another man when we are mad with one another and we fight it out and both risk ourselves in doing it.

This attempt to ring old Andy Carnegie into the debate as if he were an independent private nation of some description is on the ground that he has done what? Made millions of dollars by illicit tariff legislation, as all the balance of you did who could. There is not one of you who would not have engaged in any protected industry and made all the money out of it you could have made. It was just as Tom Johnson, of Ohio, said upon the floor of the House in the Fifty-third Congress. Somebody rose and said, "You are denouncing the tariff on steel rails. Have you not made half a million dollars or more out of the tariff on steel rails?" He said, "Yes; and I am going to keep on making it, too, as long as the people of the United States are fools enough to leave this law upon the statute book."

I am not defending Andrew Carnegie; I do not care anything about him one way or the other; but some of you seem to think that the Carnegie Endowment is subject to his influence or his power, and that he tells us what to do. He does not.

In so far as the circular which went out from certain members of the Carnegie Endowment is concerned, I did not sign that. I refused to sign it, because I did not agree with the reasoning contained in it, and because I felt it was improper for the endowment as a body to engage in current American politics. So far as I am concerned, therefore, no attack can be made upon me about that; but these other gentlemen did sign it, and they signed it as citizens of the United States. They had just as much right to do it as the Senator from Wyoming, the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from Missouri have a right to sign a public circular to-morrow. I did not sign it, because I did not agree with it. I did not agree with its reasoning, and I did not agree with the idea that we ought as members of that endowment to sign anything of any description in connection with current politics or international affairs. But to deny to Senator ROOT, for example, or to any other man who happens to be a Senator the right to sign any circular that he chooses, presenting any argument that he chooses in connection with a public question is the veriest tyranny, and you know that as well as I do. There were five of us who did not sign it.

Now, as to this talk about British dictation, do you suppose you can scare any self-respecting man with that sort of talk? You certainly can not scare any man who is of a breed that wore the American uniform against the British when the British Government was wrong and when we were right. What right has anybody to assume that, simply because the blood in a man's veins is Welsh, or English, or Scotch, and is not Irish, or German, or Slav, or Polack, therefore that man is un-American? I take it, Mr. President, that those of us who have English and Welsh and Scotch blood in our veins have as much right to be proud of it as those who have Polack, or Slav, or German, or Irish blood in their veins. But you will never catch us calling ourselves Welsh-American, or British-American, or Scotch-American, or something else. We are plain American citizens, and we have severed our allegiance to Great Britain too many hundred years ago to talk about it even.

But when you come to try to appeal to me to indulge in an argument of hatred to Great Britain, or hatred to England and to Scotland and to Wales and to Ireland, I decline to indulge in it. Their law and ours is the same; their literature and ours is the same; their language and ours is the same, and it is the noblest tongue that God ever permitted any human being to speak or write. Their ethics of commerce and ours are the same. There is nothing more dangerous in the world than to cultivate the idea that you must or must not do something because it helps or hurts some other foreign people to whom you bear no allegiance, from whom you dread no harm, for whom you bear no partiality. I do not forget that William Shakespeare was the prince of poets, that Francis Bacon was the prince of philosophers, that Huxley and Darwin and Tyndall and Sir Isaac Newton were princes of science, that Gladstone and various other great men in Great Britain, as well as various other great men of the English-speaking race, have been princes among the diplomats and governors of the world; and while I bear no hatred for any other man or any other lineage, I positively decline to apologize for my own. I am proud of the Ridley English in me, I am proud of the Alison Scotch, I am proud of the Sharp Scotch-Irish, I am proud of the Welsh Williams, and all of them to this extent only, that none of them were ever very great and none of them were ever perfectly contemptible; but at any rate I decline to apologize for the fact that I am not a hyphenated American, and I decline to join in any kennel that is unloosed upon the President of the United States denouncing his followers as pusillanimous and cowardly and un-American and pro-British, and as a blind surrender to Great Britain, and all that sort of namby-pamby nonsense.

There is not a sensible man within the sound of my voice who does not know that the President is not "cowardly," that he is not "pusillanimous," that his followers in this body are not "sycophants." We are doing what we are doing because, whether right or wrong, we think it right, and we are going to continue to do it.

I might, if I wanted, fill the RECORD with utterances from the Washington Post during the last three or four weeks, part of them quoted from Members of this body, not arguing only against the President of the United States, but grossly insulting him all the time. I do not care whether the letter which has been proffered by the Senator from Washingon is expunged from the RECORD or not. I do not think it will add much to the undignified and insulting arguments or pretensions to arguments which have already been made and become either a part of the RECORD or of the public prints.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, however broad we may consider the right of petition to be under the Constitution, there is not a word in the Constitution that provides that any petition shall be printed in the RECORD. The issue that we have before us does not involve the right of petition. It is the right to print in the RECORD. Letters and petitions are printed in the RECORD by the unanimous consent of the Senate under our rules. The Senate unanimously agreed this morning, out of courtesy to the Senator from Washington when he asked it, that a letter which he presented and wished printed in the RECORD might be printed in the RECORD. The privilege of printing did not follow on the theory that the Constitution gave a citizen a right to present his petition to the Senate. It was an entirely different procedure. It was a consent, after the letter was presented, to print in the RECORD because the request was made by the Senator from Washington.

When we heard the paper we found that it contained statements many Senators did not wish printed in the RECORD and which a Senator should not use on the floor with reference to other Senators and which certainly an outsider ought not to have the right by simply writing it in the shape of a letter to a Senator to put into the RECORD.

I object not only to the language used with reference to the Senator from New York, but I object to the general style of reference by this writer toward those of us who intend to vote to make the coastwise vessels pay tolls. There is not a statement of fact in the letter; there is not an argument in the letter. There is a style of cheap language intended to be an appeal to the public critical and discourteous toward those who differ from the writer.

I do not think that kind of matter ought to be put into the RECORD in the shape of letters. I do not believe that that style of argument should be used upon the floor of the Senate; not that I think it does the party criticized any harm. My custom has usually been when an opponent, whether a letter writer, a newspaper, or a speaker, indulges in that species of critical language, to pass it by, satisfied, as I am, that it is more calculated to injure the writer or the speaker than it is the person criticized. But to permit it to be placed in the RECORD by unanimous consent is quite different from merely ignoring it.

I really think the Senator from Washington owes it to those of us who consented to let the letter be read because he wanted it done, now that he finds we do not consent, to withdraw it. I think that is really what he owes us, because any one of us could have kept the letter out, and we did not do so, because he desired it in. I think the rule ought to be with regard to these communications which we permit to be printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent, as we begin to hear them read if any Senator objects to them the reading ought to stop, and they ought not to go into the RECORD.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, one great trouble about that is that a great deal of stuff goes into the RECORD without ever being read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would not say that was true. We do not often allow anything to go into the RECORD in the Senate without reading. We do not allow a great deal of it. We usually require matter read which goes into the RECORD.

Mr. WEST. I disagree with the senior Senator from Georgia, because time and again since I have been here matter has gone into the RECORD without having been read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not say that is not true sometimes; but the practice is not usual to allow matter put into the RECORD that is not read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course nothing could go into the RECORD without being read, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. SMOOT. For about five or six years I tried very hard, indeed, to keep a great bulk of this stuff out of the RECORD. I also tried very hard, indeed, to stop the promiscuous publishing as public documents of every speech that was delivered by every man in any part of the country upon any particular subject that he might desire or think ought to be presented to the people; but I have almost become discouraged, Mr. President. I think we ought to be a little more careful in giving unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD articles from outside sources.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it is true that within the past two years the rule requiring matter which goes into the RECORD to be first read has been relaxed a good deal, and that has been so especially during the past 12 months.

Mr. WARREN. More than ever before.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I know the first year I was in the Senate very little went into the RECORD that was not read.

Mr. WEST. I will state to the Senator that both the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] in their speeches have incorporated matter that they did not even read here, and it was not read at the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not make a speech to-day upon the question of charging coastwise vessels for going through the Panama Canal. The letter which has been read undertakes to charge all Senators who are in favor of making the coastwise vessels which go through the canal pay tolls with seeking to foster a monopoly; it undertakes to attribute the movement largely to the activities of the railroads which are interested in the subject. That is a very unjust and a very unfair style of discussion.

I would not for a moment suggest that the Senator from Washington was in favor of allowing the coastwise vessels to go through the Panama Canal free in the interests of the two corporations which control most of them. The report of the Alexander committee, of the other House, has recently shown that our coastwise vessels not owned by railroad companies are practically in the hands of two companies; that these two companies have a gentleman's agreement eliminating competition; and that they are making more money than is made by nearly any other corporation in the country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Can the Senator from Georgia give the names of those two companies?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not give their names; I do not recall them; but they are given in the report.

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senator is right in his statement, but I merely wanted to have the names of the companies given.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not give the Senator the names at this time; but, I repeat, they are in the report of the Alexander committee. The names of all the companies and the agreements between the companies are printed, and the final conclusion is reached that, barring those ships controlled by the railroads, practically all the balance of the vessels engaged in coastwise transportation are controlled by two corporations. Then the statement is made that a gentleman's agreement exists between them by which they do not actually compete, but that they visit different ports and at different times. So the business is distributed between them.

Yet we might just as fairly charge the Senator from Washington with serving the prosperous corporations holding a monopoly of the coastwise transportation as can his letter writer charge that Senators who wish all vessels to pay tolls are influenced by monopolies.

The charge of the letter writer is unfounded and very improper.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, upon that point the Alexander committee shows very clearly that the transcontinental railroads control a very considerable number of the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and that the railroads control—I will not say the transcontinental railroads—but that the railroads control all of the through business upon the Great Lakes; that as to those vessels which engage in the coastwise trade that might take them through the canal a large number of those vessels are controlled by the transcontinental railroads, and that substantially all the rest of the vessels, while they are owned by numerous companies, those companies are tied together by a system of interlocking directorates and stock control, which practically puts them under one management. There is a map showing the lines of connection between these different companies, and they are so numerous and cross and recross each other at so many points that the map becomes a curiosity and the eye can hardly follow the numerous lines. I say, in consonance with what the Senator has said, that I think there is not a doubt on earth that all of those vessels are practically in one combination.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, a little later I hope upon the floor of the Senate to present fully the status of these companies. We all know that they are protected against competition with foreign-owned vessels; we know that no vessel which floats any but the flag of the United States can engage in our coastwise trade; we know they are given a monopoly of the business by our statutes, which prevent foreign-owned vessels from doing any coastwise trade. This report shows clearly from them that they have been most prosperous. I am glad that they are prosperous. It can also easily be shown that the Panama Canal will be of vast benefit to them not only in the saving of time and in the matter of convenience, but the lessened cost of transportation will be from two to three dollars per cargo ton. The tolls proposed to be charged are from 40 cents to 80 cents per cargo ton.

Mr. President, I would not wish to introduce a letter dwelling upon these facts and saying that the Senator from the State of Washington had lined up behind this monopoly engaged in the coastwise trade, and undertake to reflect upon his conduct upon the theory that he was moved solely by the desire to serve this coastwise monopoly. I know he is not. If I had introduced that kind of a letter and obtained the consent of the Senate to introduce it, and the Senator suggested that he objected to it, I would withdraw it.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I did not hear read the letter which the Senator is discussing, but I have great confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Georgia. In the opinion of the Senator would the matter stated in that letter, if it had been used on the floor of the Senate in discussion or in an address, be objectionable?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think part of the letter would have been objectionable if the language contained therein had been used by a Senator on the floor, and that such Senator could have been called to order for it. I think other portions of it, to which I suggested an objection, might not reach the degree of impropriety, if used by a Senator, that would necessitate his being called to order; but I went beyond the mere language which would bring a Senator to his seat if called to order, and indicated a further objection to it in that it seeks to generally cast an aspersion upon Senators that they are simply backing a great monopoly and are moved by that purpose rather than an earnest desire to find out what is right.

Mr. KENYON. I heard on yesterday, Mr. President, the motives and patriotism of practically every Senator on this side of the Chamber—but one, I think, was excluded—assailed in a speech on this floor. If the motives of Senators are to be assailed, I really believe that it would come with better grace to have them assailed by those outside of the Chamber than those within it. While I hope this letter may be withdrawn, I feel that it goes no further than did the remarks that were made yesterday on this floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is this difference: Where a letter requires unanimous consent in order to be read into the RECORD, if we allow that kind of language used, we all become a party to it; while if one Senator sees fit to use language improperly severe with reference to another Senator, he alone is responsible for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I was merely going to ask the question as to whether the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] had made a request since the laying aside of the unfinished business to withdraw this letter. Did I understand the Senator to make such a request?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator from Washington answers, I want to make one further statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield, and to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I have yielded the floor until Senators get through.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has yielded to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not think that I was encroaching upon the Senator from Idaho. I am perfectly willing to take my seat.

Mr. BORAH. I yielded the floor to the Senator, and I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] answers the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] I want to add to what I said a little while ago with reference to modifying the letter. If the Senator from Washington eliminates all that was objectionable from the letter, I do not think I will object to his presenting the balance of it to-morrow; but I think there is a great deal of it in a style of expression and in a tone of insinuation reflecting upon those Senators who are going to vote to make the coastwise vessels pay tolls, reflections that the Senator himself would not use in debate.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask my colleague, the senior Senator from Georgia, a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in a moment. So that all Senators may know just exactly the situation as to what is before the Senate, I ask the Senator from Washington if he has requested the withdrawal of the letter since the unfinished business was laid aside?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have not made any such request since then; in fact, I have not made it at all. I did request what the Senator from Georgia referred to, to eliminate from the letter such portions of it as contained any personal reference to Senators. My intention in reading this letter was concentrated upon the question of the canal tolls. I had not noticed, in fact, except in the most casual way, any reference to Senators. I know Mr. Bainbridge Colby, who wrote this letter and who is a very distinguished lawyer in New York, and from my knowledge of him I am satisfied that it was not his intention to make any insinuation of improper conduct against any Member of the Senate. I think he simply intended to point out in a forceful way the position which Senators had taken with reference to this question and the interests that were involved in it. I did request to be allowed to withdraw certain portions of this letter.

Mr. SMOOT. And that request was denied?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think it has been put to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was objection by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I objected to this letter, not alone because it selected certain Senators for criticism, but because the tone of the entire letter is insinuating and insulting to all of those who take a view different from that which is expressed by the writer of this letter, and as such it ought not to have gone into the RECORD at all. The first two paragraphs place all of those who disagree with the writer——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment—in the position of fostering the interests of some monopoly or some railroad interest, or something of that character, and I can not find a single paragraph in the letter that is not along that same line.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, what I rose to ask the Senator from North Dakota was that he be kind enough to read those portions of the letter which are objectionable. I regret to say that I did not hear the letter read, and so I am ignorant of its contents.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, I do not care about going over the letter. The whole letter has been read into the RECORD; but the very first portion of it is:

> First. That the reasons assigned by the repealers for the surrender of our rights in a matter of purely domestic regulation, such as the exemption of American coastwise shipping from toll payment, have been abandoned, one after the other, until the repeal is now sought on the ground that the forces behind the repeal—

I do not know what is meant by "the forces behind the repeal," but of course there is an insinuation of what those forces are when you follow the letter through—> merely want it. They have fixed their desires upon it, and their "arguments" are now only reiterated requests for what they want.

> Second. That the interests of monopoly, or of subsidy, or of special privilege—call it what you like—are fighting on the side of repeal.

The inference being that those who are battling in favor of this bill are necessarily in alliance and in connection with those interests. That sentence standing alone might not be given that construction; but if you will read the whole letter, you can not give it any construction different from that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have heard him use language in the debate which was to the effect that those of us who are favoring tolls exemption were favoring certain monopolies and certain monopolistic interests. That is the view which each side seems to entertain of the other side.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just by way of illustration, and to put this matter in its real, true light, I recall during the speech of the Senator from North Dakota on the general question a very striking statement, which arrested my attention at the time, something to the effect that the proposition to exempt domestic ships from the payment of tolls in the canal was burglary upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I said the effect of that was burglary upon the Treasury of the United States; but I have accused no Senator or anyone else taking a different view from mine of being impelled by any motives other than those that are perfectly honorable; nor have I assumed that they, in expressing their views, were but the servants or the agents of any monopoly, and that is what this letter intimates as to those who favor the repeal of the exemption clause.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me, the necessary implication of the Senator's remarks was that all those who are aiding and abetting the exemption of American coastwise ships from the payment of tolls would be accessories before the fact of burglary.

Mr. McCUMBER. O Mr. President, the Senator can not bring any remarks that I made and put them upon a parallel with these in their intent or purposes.

I objected to the letter also upon the ground that from the beginning to the end the statements were false as to the position of those Senators and others who favored the repeal, and especially as to the President himself. I want to call the Senator's attention to one thing that I said was an unjust, unfair, and false accusation. It reads thus:

> The statement with which the President introduced the question to the consideration of Congress, that the exemption of our coastwise shipping from toll payment is "in plain contravention" of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is heard no more.

He says that the President has abandoned that position, and proceeds:

> That the force of this proposition is felt by the repealers is shown by their shift from an appeal to "honor" to an appeal to our magnanimity. To use the phrase of the President, we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, so that "we may deserve our reputation for generosity."

The President has not shifted his position, as the Senator from Washington and every other Senator knows. No Senator who has taken the view that I have upon this question has shifted his position at all. I have taken the position squarely that it was a question of honor with us to fulfill a contract obligation, and I believed that that was the only construction that should be given to that contract.

There is quoted in this letter the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] upon that question, but only a portion of it is quoted, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] requotes a portion of the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts as the basis of a reason why we should not vote for the repeal. I want to put into the RECORD right now the final conclusion of the Senator from Massachusetts, which should have followed that portion which was given by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I want to insert it at this point, so that we may see whether the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts was an argument that we were not bound in honor to give to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty a construction in accordance with the views that were given at the time it was adopted and as understood by both parties to that contract.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. I will state to the Senator that my purpose in rising is to address a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STONE. I should like to know whether this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would say yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has been proceeding on that line, and under the circumstances I ask that the Senator allow me to have inserted and read a single paragraph of the address made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I ask that it may be inserted as an answer to the deduction drawn from that address by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. STONE. Undoubtedly there will not be any trouble about that. I wish now to say that unless the debate on this comparatively unimportant question concerning this letter is very speedily concluded I shall make the point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hardly think the point of order can be made, because I asked unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business, so that this matter might be discussed. Therefore I think its discussion comes within the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another rule that might dispose of it. If any Senator should address the Chair more than twice on this proposition, his attention would be called to that rule before a great while.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think I have addressed the Senate more than twice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it not true that the Senate has given unanimous consent that this matter shall proceed until it is concluded, and then return to the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the fact.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is my understanding.

Mr. JONES. I understood that this matter was taken up on motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the unfinished business was temporarily laid aside, with direction to continue the consideration of the pending matter until disposed of.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment. Let me ask that this extract from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts may be read, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me say before that proceeds that if this debate is going to be shortened by parliamentary tactics, I shall call for the regular order, and we will get this matter up so that we can discuss it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It can not be shortened by parliamentary tactics, because the Senate, by unanimous consent, has agreed that it shall go on.

Mr. BORAH. If that is the view of the Chair, as well as that of the Senator from Connecticut, it is all right.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the RECORD read on that. I do not think that a unanimous-consent request to lay aside the unfinished business in order that a particular matter before the Senate may be proceeded with can be considered as a unanimous-consent agreement for the indefinite consideration of that matter. If the matter itself were the subject of a point of order, then the mere incident of laying aside the unfinished business that the Senate might proceed with the matter by unanimous consent would not prevent a point of order being interposed. But, in any event, I should like to know exactly what the observation of the Senator from North Dakota was at the time the unfinished business was laid aside. I will not press it just now; I will not interrupt the proceeding now, except to say that it seems to me that practically three hours of time consumed in the discussion of a matter that all of us must admit is of very secondary importance is quite enough. We are delaying other public business here of real importance and wasting the time of the Senate. I give notice that if a point of order will lie against this procedure, unless Senators in charge of the matter now pending shall conclude it at a very early moment, I shall certainly do anything I can to put an end to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota has requested the reading of a certain document which has been sent to the desk.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator from North Dakota yielded to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply wish to say, with reference to the remark of the Senator from Missouri that this is a comparatively unimportant matter, that I do not so regard it. I think that where a slander is perpetrated by an outsider upon one of the most distinguished Senators in this body, and introduced here, the Senate not knowing what it was giving unanimous consent to, and put in the printed and enduring record of the proceedings of this body, whether it shall be expunged or not, is not a trivial nor an unimportant matter. I think it is a matter of the highest privilege.

Mr. REED and Mr. JONES addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for the reading of the matter I send to the desk before I yield the floor.

Mr. JONES. Before consent is given to the reading I wish to ask the Senator a question. One of the criticisms the Senator makes against this letter is that it is a part of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but not all. Now, as I understand, the Senator asks to present part of it, and not all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I asked to present the other side of the matter already presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, because, while that presented one of the views of the Senator from Massachusetts, I thought it was very proper that the views upon which he based his conclusions should be also inserted, in order that we might the better understand what his views were. I think the Senator will agree with me that that is not only justice to him, but justice to those who agree with him on his conclusions.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, suppose it is expunged from the RECORD—then what happens?

Mr. McCUMBER. The argument is not expunged; it will be only the letter.

Mr. JONES. Is it the Senator's position that the Senator from Massachusetts does not clearly argue and clearly express the opinion that our action in exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is not a violation of the treaty? Does the Senator contend that the Senator from Massachusetts takes any other position than that upon our action, so far as it affects the treaty?

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will just listen to the reading of this——

Mr. JONES. No; that is exactly what I want to have determined. If the Senator takes that position——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly I do; certainly.

Mr. JONES. Then I object to the reading of the speech unless all of it is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We must conform somewhat to our rules. Does the Senator from Washington object to the reading by the Secretary of the document sent to the desk by the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I do, unless the entire speech of the Senator from Massachusetts is read.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask, then, for the return of the matter, in order that I may read it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be returned to the Senator, who can read it himself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Just as soon as I finish this.

Mr. SMOOT. Just for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator whether he reads this to impugn the motives of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator knows me well enough to know that I impugn the motives of no Senator. It is not necessary for the Senator from Utah to ask that question of the Senator from North Dakota. He will look through the RECORD a long time before he will ever find an instance in which I have intentionally impugned the motives of a Senator. I have tried to be extremely careful in that respect.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the reason I asked the question was this: The Senator from New Hampshire referred to the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts for the purpose of showing that the motives of those who believe in exemption from tolls and who are against the repeal should not be impugned, and he quoted a part of the Senator's speech for the reason that improper motives had been imputed to the Senator from New York by the writer of the article asked to be printed in the RECORD. What I thought was that if now another part of a speech of the Senator from Massachusetts were read, it would be for some purpose, and I had no intention whatever of imputing to the Senator from North Dakota anything wrong, but thought to read a part of a speech to disprove the statement that the Senator from North Dakota was impugning the motives of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator knows that I would never, under any circumstances, impugn the motives of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been out of the Chamber from necessity for a little while; but I wish to say that I read from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] of July 17, 1912, and I listened very attentively to the Senator from Massachusetts in his recent speech, and I understood him to say distinctly that he had not changed his views as to the right of our Government to exempt from the payment of tolls our coastwise vessels. I think I must have heard him correctly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood the Senator correctly, and the Senator from New Hampshire states his position exactly correctly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is about to quote from the speech of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. I wish to ask the Senator if he indorses the position of the Senator from Massachusetts upon the tolls question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated that I indorse his conclusion. I stated that before.

The Senator from New Hampshire presented the view of the Senator from Massachusetts, which view was to the effect that taking the treaty by itself he could construe it, and did construe it, to give us the right to differentiate in favor of our own vessels in the matter of tolls. That was correct. That was the position of the Senator from Massachusetts. He also stated, however, in connection with the same bill, that the other countries of the world did not view the matter in that light; that it was very questionable whether his own view was right; and that he gave the reason which I shall now read why his conclusion was that as a matter of national honor, from his standpoint—not from the standpoint of anybody else, not from the standpoint of the Senator from New Hampshire or from mine, but from his standpoint—we were still in honor bound to give it that construction. That is what I wish now to put into the RECORD in order fully and explicitly to place the Senator's position correctly before the people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I take it the Senator does not argue that the Senator from Massachusetts, in his speech of July 17, 1912, made the observation which the Senator is about to make?

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. That must have been in his speech of this year.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should have stated that if the Senator had allowed me.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a discovery the Senator has made since he made his speech in 1912.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I must say I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts discovered it after that, because I think he has indicated that he had that view all along, as far as the understanding of the other parties is concerned.

I read from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on page 17:

> I now come to another point which weighs very strongly with me in deciding against giving relief from tolls to American ships by the method employed by the canal act. Whatever our opinion may be as to the strict legal interpretation of the rules governing the matter of tolls imposed upon vessels passing through the canal, we can not and we ought not to overlook the understanding of those who negotiated the treaty as to the intent and effect of the rules which they framed. As to the nature of the understanding we have direct testimony. Mr. Henry White, who first laid before the British Government the desire of the United States to enter into negotiations for the supersession of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, has stated that Lord Salisbury expressed to him the entire willingness of England to remove all obstacles which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty put in the way of the construction of the canal, and desired only to maintain equality of tolls imposed upon all vessels, including those of the United States. Mr. Choate, who, as I have said, completed the negotiations which resulted in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, has publicly stated that the understanding at that time of both parties was the same as that given by Mr. White. The only other American concerned in the actual negotiations of the treaty was the late Mr. Hay, at that time Secretary of State. I know that Mr. Hay's view was the same as that of Mr. Choate and Mr. White. It is therefore clear on the testimony of our three negotiators that the negotiations as they were begun and as they were completed in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty proceeded on the clear understanding that there was to be no discrimination in the tolls imposed as between the vessels of any nation, including the vessels of the United States.
> I am well aware that an understanding of this sort, although an aid perhaps to interpretation, does not bind legally. But there is such a thing as honor in agreements and transactions between nations as there is in agreements between individuals.

That is the conclusion of the Senator from Massachusetts upon the duty that is now confronting us—not that we are legally bound, but that under all the circumstances, the parties to the contract understanding it in a certain way, we are in honor bound to give it the construction which both parties understood at the time they adopted it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me at that point to read another brief extract from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can read any of it he sees fit. I stated as clearly as I could that the Senator from Massachusetts took the position that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we were not bound to refrain from discrimination in favor of our own vessels. No part of his quoted argument would make it stronger than I have stated it.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator, in answer to a question of mine, to say that the Senator from Massachusetts did not take the position that we had the right to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; on the contrary, he did take that position, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire and as quoted from him, both in his speech in 1912 and in his recent speech; but he stated further that the parties to the agreement had both given it a different construction, and indicated in that portion of his speech which I have quoted that he therefore felt we were in honor bound to give the agreement a construction which the parties to it gave when they adopted it.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE AND HAY-BUNAU-VARILLA TREATIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to the resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in relation to the negotiation and application of certain treaties on the subject of the construction of an interoceanic canal.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 24, 1914.

(Inclosures, as stated.)

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, after making at once the point that I purposed to make, I desire, at the conclusion of the call, to move an executive session; but before making that motion I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hollis	Page	Smoot
Brady	Hughes	Poindexter	Sterling
Brandegee	James	Ransdell	Stone
Burleigh	Jones	Reed	Sutherland
Burton	Kenyon	Robinson	Thornton
Catron	Kern	Saulsbury	Tillman
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Clapp	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Sherman	Weeks
Clarke, Ark.	McCumber	Shields	West
Fall	McLean	Shively	Williams
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.	Works
Goff	Overman	Smith, S. C.

Mr. PAGE. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] are necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That fact will be noted.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], who has a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]; also the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], who has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. GRONNA], who has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on important business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Before anything further is done, the Chair desires to make an announcement. The Chair announced the reference of a communication from the President, together with accompanying documents, to the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals. He is now advised by the Secretary that in view of the nature of certain documents accompanying the message it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Unless there is objection, that will be done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, on that very matter, do I understand that the Chair has referred the whole matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not look through the documents to select the different ones.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may be pardoned for doing so, I will state that the documents are sent in response to a resolution which I introduced as a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, which is now holding hearings upon the bill to which the treaties relate. I do not know what caused the Chair to change his mind about the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are documents here which have not been made public.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the President of the United States, in responding to the resolution, considers it not incompatible with the public interest to send them to the Senate, need they go to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was the Chair's impression that they should have gone to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, but, representations having been made to the Chair as to the character of the documents, the Chair has been constrained to change the reference.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was out of the Chamber at the time, and did not know such representations had been made. I asked for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reference will be to the Committee on Foreign Relations, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. Without printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without printing, of course.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I rise to a personal explanation. I have understood since coming into the Chamber that the RECORD seems to disclose that I made objection to the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to strike from the letter certain words which are considered offensive. I desire to say that I did not make that objection, technically speaking. I did say that I hoped the Senator would withdraw the whole communication, and that unless it were withdrawn I should feel like voting for the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to state that while I was occupying the chair a few moments ago the inquiry was made whether objection had been made to the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] for unanimous consent to insert the letter with certain parts stricken out. I stated that objection had been made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], and so understood it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in order to remove any misapprehension in regard to the matter, I will repeat the statement that I do not desire to have printed in the RECORD anything which is deemed offensive or which by any reasonable interpretation can be so construed. Therefore I again make the request to withdraw certain portions of this letter which are deemed offensive, and I will state that I am perfectly willing to abide by the advice of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] as to what should be eliminated from it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is that of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to strike out the entire communication presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and read by the Secretary. The Chair presumes that might be amended so as to move to strike out certain parts of the communication that may be indicated hereafter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think my request could be granted by unanimous consent, and I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to say a word about the communication.

I think a petition to the Senate should be received, if it is couched in respectful language, and referred to a committee. I should not object in the case of ordinary matters to letters or petitions being printed in the RECORD. I gave notice a few days ago that there were so many people writing pamphlets and arguments on the Panama Canal tolls matter that if Senators should be allowed to print them in the RECORD a large portion of the morning hour every day, as has happened to-day, would be consumed, first, by the reading of lengthy communications, and then by a precipitation of debate on the floor upon the merits of the canal-tolls question.

That is what has happened here. I should have objected to this or any other paper on this subject being printed in the RECORD had I been on the floor this morning when it was presented. I was detained elsewhere by my public duties. When I did arrive, I asked what was being done, and was informed that unanimous consent had been given.

When Senators gave unanimous consent that this document should be read from the desk, and hence read into the RECORD, they did not know what it contained. They were granting a courtesy to the Senator from Washington. I not only regard this document as specifically slanderous as to a particular Senator, but I think its whole tone is unworthy of a respectful petition to any legislative body.

If it is the sense of the Senate that they want to pass this document around, quibble as to what is particularly offensive to each Senator and what he wishes to go out, and then have the shreds and remainder of it go in here in that expurgated form, they can vote to do so. I think this so-called petition ought to be refused admission to the RECORD. It is not really a petition. It is a circular letter, addressed to Senators, not even mentioning the Senators by name, simply "Dear sirs," slipped into the mails, one of them presented here not from the constituent of the Senator who presented it, and permission asked to have it printed in the RECORD. It is a circular from a constituent of the Senator from the great State of New York, presented here by a Senator from the Pacific coast, and printed in the RECORD, containing a direct attack upon the senior Senator from New York.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just on that point I should like to explain that the letter was sent out by a committee, and that a portion of the membership of the committee are constituents of mine.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That I did not know; but it does not change the fact that the letter contains the official heading of some association organized, I assume, to take sides in this controversy and contains the names of some of the officials. It is signed by Bainbridge Colby, a gentleman of whose acquaintance I have not the pleasure. The question for the Senate to decide in this matter is if this letter, couched in terms which have been read to the Senate, is to be admitted here. If it is, I do not know how the Senate can protect itself from attacks by outsiders upon individual Senators and upon the Senate itself.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not yield at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I for one will resent with as much heat, and, I think, with as much good cause, an attack on any Senator on this floor on either side of the central aisle as I would if it were made upon myself. It is an attack upon the body if an individual Senator is insulted in this way, and I think it is time the Senate should decide whether it is going to permit Senators to stand up here and introduce letters which are sent to them containing offensive matter and which the Senator introducing it afterwards admitted he had read only casually and did not understand the intendment of it, and then when his attention is called to it insists upon its going in the RECORD in an expurgated form. I think it is time this funneling into the RECORD of attacks by outsiders who can not be reached by Senators here, either by the Senate or by the Senator attacked, should stop. I for one would not hesitate one minute to refuse this document access to the RECORD, and I would do it with equal cheerfulness if it was an attack on the other side of the controversy; and I would not allow it to go to a committee of the Senate couched in this language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut object to the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. GALLINGER, and others rose.

Mr. STONE. I see two or three Senators rising, I presume, to address the Senate on this letter question. I think we have spent enough time upon it. If we could have a vote upon the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] at once, I would be very glad to yield for that purpose; but I am unwilling, for one, to continue what seems to me to be a useless debate.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator permit me just a word?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say to the Senator that if the Senator from Utah will accept the amendment to strike out the offensive matter I will consent to vote at once. Otherwise I shall not consent to a vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will yield to me just a moment, I do not want to be unreasonable about this matter and I do not want to appear to be unreasonable; but it seems to me that a motion simply to strike out the offensive matter in this letter would not at all meet the situation. Here is a letter which has been presented to the Senate and has been read which contains some things that seem to me to be grossly offensive and insulting not only to the particular Senator who is attacked but to the Senate itself. Now, it does seem to me that for the Senate of the United States to take a document of that kind and solemnly sit here and edit it by striking out the offensive matter is not in keeping with the dignity of this body. It appears to me that the letter either ought to be expunged from the RECORD or the Senator from Washington should withdraw it. If the Senator from Washington chooses to withdraw the letter and it should be subsequently presented to the Senate with the objectionable matter eliminated, I, for one, should not object to its reception; but the thing I do object to is for the Senate to take the letter and go through the process of editing it by taking out the offensive matter. The Senate has to maintain its dignity, and it seems to me it should reject the entire letter, it having been presented in this form. I could not accept in that view the proposed amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. STONE. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before that motion is put, would it not be well to make some provision for withholding the document, which has been objected to, from the RECORD pending the final disposition of the motion of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STONE. If that can be done, I withhold the motion.

Mr. BORAH. The advocate of this letter has offered everything that is reasonable—that is, that all offensive matter be stricken out. Now, if that is not to be agreed to, those who believe that the rest of it ought to go in the RECORD will object to any compromise upon the proposition any further, and it will not be disposed of in any other way than under the strict technical rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order that the Chair may be advised as to the strict technical rule, the Chair takes the liberty of asking his friend the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] whether the Chair has authority to direct that the document shall be withheld from the RECORD pending the disposition of the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I feel flattered at the suggestion, but not being in the chair I must decline to give an opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the responsibility of saying that the document shall not go into the RECORD until the motion is disposed of.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 3 hours and 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 253) reappropriating funds for expenditures at the naval station at New Orleans, La., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

NAVAL STATION AT NEW ORLEANS, LA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 253) reappropriating funds for expenditure at the naval station at New Orleans, La., was read twice by its title.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, as it is an emergency measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the naval station, New Orleans, La., and not yet turned back into the Treasury, to be reappropriated and made available for expenditure at that station for such purpose as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. THORNTON, the title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution reappropriating certain funds for expenditure at the naval station at New Orleans, La."

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 25, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 24, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We give Thee hearty thanks, our heavenly Father, that though there are differences of opinion, diversities of thought among our people upon questions which seem vital to us as individuals, yet in times of great crisis, when the honor of our Nation is assailed, we can lay aside all differences and rally with one accord to the support of our flag. Strengthen, we beseech Thee, our patriotic fervor, that our Nation may continue to grow in all that makes a nation great and glorious, and Thine shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution authorizing the Vocational Education Commission to employ such stenographic and clerical assistants as may be necessary, etc.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following House concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 36.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people, of Michigan for the statue of Zachariah Chandler, whose name is so honorably identified with the history of that State and of the United States.

Resolved, That this work of art is accepted in the name of the Nation and assigned a place in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, already set aside by act of Congress for statues of eminent citizens, and that a copy of this resolution, signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Michigan.

LOBBY ACTIVITIES.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith for printing under the rules a privileged report (No. 570) from the Committee on the Judiciary on the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] on December 9 last, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, touching the investigation of lobby charges. I desire to notify the House at this time that at some future date which will suit the convenience of the House the matter will be called up for consideration in the House.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can the gentleman give the House some idea about when he intends to call this up? It is a privileged resolution.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state that it is my purpose to call the matter up within a very short time and without unnecessary delay. I think it prudent, inasmuch as the report has not been made public, to give the Members ample time to study the report. I think I shall probably call it up within the next five or six days; but in doing so I will take into consideration the business and convenience of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] submits a privileged report on the Garrett resolution touching the lobby investigation, to be printed under the rules.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I take it that this report will be referred to the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. That is correct. It will be referred to the House Calendar and printed.

INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from further consideration of House resolution 467, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 467.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives, for its information, all the facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission which show or tend to show that said commission has in many cases failed to grant an increase in freight rates to the railroads where no objections to such increase have been filed, and where the shippers in many instances have requested that such increase be granted on the ground that it was just and reasonable.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I take it that it is offered as a privileged resolution?

Mr. LEVY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it calls for an opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the resolution calls for—

All the facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission which show, or tend to show, that said commission has in many cases failed to grant an increase in freight rates, etc.

Unquestionably, to my mind, that calls for an opinion.

The SPEAKER. Wherein does it call for an opinion?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The language "which show, or tend to show," it seems to me, calls for an opinion.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order that this is not privileged, because the resolution is not addressed to the head of a department. In order to make a resolution of this character privileged it must be addressed to the head of one of the departments.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty about that contention is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not in any department.

Mr. HAY. There is no provision in the rule which makes an inquiry addressed to the President, as this is, or to the Interstate Commerce Commission, privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that matter was passed upon by the House in the celebrated case where the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Gillespie, presented a resolution which was exactly like this one. No one raised the question of whether it called for an opinion, and it went through.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Interstate Commerce Commission is an independent governmental function.

The SPEAKER. But the House settled that by passing the Gillespie resolution. The Chair refers to the point of asking the President for information. The Gillespie resolution was in terms precisely like this one, and the House, by its action, decided that we could call upon the President for information from the Interstate Commerce Commission. That much of it is settled. Upon the other question which the gentleman raises, as to its calling for an opinion, the Chair will hear the gentleman. In the case of the Gillespie resolution no one raised the point that it called for an opinion, and some of us remember what the appearance of the newspapers here in Washington the next morning was after that transaction.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I was not apprised that this old resolution was to be brought to the attention of the Speaker and the House this morning. On yesterday there was some discussion between the Speaker, the author of the resolution, and myself, and the author, it appeared, under proper advice had introduced a new and proper resolution. That new resolution eliminates some of these words. That new resolution was referred to our committee. Seven days not having expired from the introduction of it, the committee was not called upon to act, or we probably would have done so at to-day's meeting. Being unaware that this resolution was to be again called up, I did not happen to come in in time to hear the prayer and the speech and motion of the gentleman from New York, but I wish to say, as the matter concerns the committee of which I happen to be the chairman, that the Gillespie resolution did not involve the question raised by the gentleman from Tennessee at all. After the resolution had passed the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Dalzell, moved to reconsider, in order to make the point that the President was not the head of a department. The committee never seriously insisted upon that; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania did it, and we allowed that to go.

Mr. MANN. Was not that after it passed the House?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir; after we passed the resolution the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my recollection is, moved to reconsider in order to make that point. But the point I make and the one the gentleman from Tennessee raised was not involved at all. The committee does not seem to have made much fight upon it at that time, but the point here, Mr. Speaker, is, if I may be allowed to impress my views upon the Chair, that this is not a call for facts at all. This language asks for an argument and opinion and requires an investigation to find out what the facts are that tend to show certain things. If he had asked the President to give him the facts shown, as to what the papers show, what the claims are instituted on in the papers or anything of that sort that are physical facts, it would be a different thing. This resolution proposes for the President to make inquiry to find out about certain cases filed by the railroads, to find out how many people objected to, if any, to find out how many were unobjected to as to the raise in rates asked, and report what the facts are which show or tend to show certain things. It is a direction to investigate matters not in the knowledge of the President. It is unnecessary; the facts are in the knowledge of the commission. It does not ask them definitely to give certain facts in the case. The committee did not believe it was a privileged resolution, and therefore the committee did not feel called upon to disregard and set aside more important business before the committee in order to rush a report on this resolution. If, however, we had not been misled by the introduction of the new resolution, and that this one would not again be insisted on, we would have reported this one back to-day with recommendation that it lie on the table.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, to answer my colleague——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor unless he yields.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was through, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LEVY. I would like to state——

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor and yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman wants to ask me a question, I will try to answer it some way.

Mr. LEVY. I was not convinced yesterday, and I am not convinced now——

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, the gentleman knows there is a piece of poetry about convincing a party against his will, and that he is of the same opinion still.

Mr. LEVY. If my colleague will give me time and a hearing before the committee, but I have been unable to get a hearing before the committee——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I was not aware the gentleman desired to be heard on this proposition.

Mr. LEVY. I told the gentleman so.

Mr. ADAMSON. He desired to be heard on a general proposition to raise railroad rates, but I had good reasons that I did not care to take up the time to hear him on that. I am willing to hear him if he wants to come and discuss parliamentary law on this resolution.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, have I the floor?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman wishes to discuss the point of order, I will be glad to hear the gentleman first and then be recognized.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I think it is clearly a question of facts, and I refer the Speaker to Hinds' Precedents, page 175, section 1873, where Mr. PAYNE made objection and the Speaker ruled:

> Now, the Chair is perfectly clear, under the precedents, if the resolution is to be made privileged, it must be a resolution of inquiry as to facts existing.

That is plain.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman please send up the volume?

Mr. LEVY. Certainly. There is no opinion about it; it is a clear statement of facts. There are several hundred cases, with no objection whatsoever filed, where they have consented to them, and in the Toledo case the shippers themselves asked for the increase.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman concluded?

Mr. LEVY. The Speaker is examining the Precedents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it seems so very clear to me that the words "or tend to show" included in this resolution necessarily call for a reason, for the exercise of discretion on the part of the President, that it falls without the rule. How can the facts be reported that are called for under this resolution without the exercise of some discretion? How is it possible to conceive that the language, "or tend to show," does not call for a reason upon the part of the President or upon the part of whoever may make up the report? It is very clear it does not call simply for the facts. I may be confused about the matter in my mind.

Mr. LEVY. May I interrupt my colleague?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. I can not see how there could be plainer language. It is the facts. They are existing facts, and there is no opinion about it. It is simply a question of existing facts, public notoriety, and so forth.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The language says, "which show or tend to show that said commission has in many cases." In many cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Tennessee this question: What is the difference between facts which show and facts which tend to show, as far as this thing is concerned?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Because those which tend to show call for an opinion upon the part of the reporting authority. It calls for the exercise of his judgment as to whether they tend to show or do not tend to show. I think also, perhaps, that might apply to "which show," as far as that is concerned.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MANN. Which calls for more of an opinion, that which calls for facts "which show" or facts which "tend to show"?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That would tend to strengthen the position which I have taken.

Mr. MANN. How would you call for facts without getting the opinion of an official of some sort as to facts relating to the subject matter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. "Facts relating to it" is different.

Mr. MANN. Unless you call for a specific paper, do you not have to call for facts, and the officer who responds furnishes facts which, in his opinion, meet the situation? Is not that calling for an opinion from him?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That may be; but that destroys the privilege of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to hear from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] again on that point.

Mr. MANN. I will likely take the floor in a moment. I was asking the gentleman if facts which show a thing do not require as much of an opinion as facts which tend to show a thing. This does not call for the opinion of an officer, but when you call for facts, unless you call for a specific paper, the officer must exercise his judgment as to what facts shall be presented. That is not calling for the opinion of the officer, but, of course, he must exercise his reason when he responds to a resolution calling for facts of any kind.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Probably so; and when those are called for it destroys the privileged character of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. What destroys the privileged character of a resolution is calling for the opinion of the officer. We do not ask the opinion of the officer.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If the facts called for necessitate the expression on the part of an officer or the use of discretion, it destroys its privileged character.

Mr. MANN. Take this case, which the gentleman will recall: A resolution was introduced in the House calling upon the War Department for facts, showing how much money had been expended on account of our possession of the Philippine Islands. I think the gentleman is familiar with it?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I made the point of order that it required the opinion of the officers, which point is practically sustained now, because they say they could not give the information. But the Speaker decided, although the officer might have to exercise his judgment in reporting, the resolution only called for facts. Now, of course, when you figure out how much the Philippine Islands have cost, that requires the exercise of reason, at best, to determine how much more is charged for the Army because officers are in the Philippines than would be charged if we did not have the Philippines, and the Speaker ruled, and I agreed with his ruling, and followed it afterwards, although I made the point of order, that all it called for was facts. It seems to me that case was stronger on the gentleman's side than the present case.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I remember the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I will agree with the gentleman about this, that I do not think such a resolution ought to pass.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think such a resolution is privileged.

The SPEAKER. That is one thing, and another thing is whether it is privileged or not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I can make it any clearer than I have made it. Perhaps I have not made it clear. But if this does not call for the exercise of discretion on the part of the authorities that will report in response to it——

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. SHARP. I was greatly impressed by what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said, and I think he is entirely correct in his position. Are not these words used purely as descriptive matter referring to a certain class of facts, and would they not mean exactly the same as though you used the words relating to that particular class of cases?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so at all. I think the words "relating to" would place it in a different class.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will ask how it would be possible for the President to comply with this information? In order to furnish the information he would have to be a mind reader in order to make the investigation. I do not think this resolution could require him to make this investigation.

Mr. LEVY. This is all public record.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It says:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives, for its information, all the facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission—

And so forth. How is it possible for the President of the United States to know?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Texas that the House passed on that question, and the then Speaker passed on it. Both the House and the Speaker concluded that it was proper to pass a resolution like this—that is, so far as this one point is concerned—calling on the President to furnish the facts from the Interstate Commerce Commission, because the Interstate Commerce Commission is in no department. That matter is res adjudicata.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes, Mr. Speaker, but the question which the gentleman from Texas suggested was not whether it was proper to call upon the President or that it might be within our power to call upon the President, but how was it possible for the President to furnish those facts, under the wording of this resolution, without the exercise of discretion?

Mr. LEVY. If you will allow me, I will say that this is all of public record.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York, under those circumstances, should have asked for the record, and not for something that may call for exercise of discretion on the part of the President.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] this question: Suppose this resolution had been drawn to the effect that the President was thereby requested to furnish to the House the facts on which the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to do this thing; would not that clearly have been within the rule?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I doubt it.

The SPEAKER. How could you ever get at the Interstate Commerce Commission then?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. You can call for specific facts without calling for an action taken based upon those facts. You can call for the facts; but if you call for any conclusion or any proposition that requires the exercise of discretion on the part of a department or on the part of the President or on the part of such a body as the Interstate Commerce Commission, it falls without the rule. There is a way of getting at those things.

The SPEAKER. Well, it is to be presumed that if the Interstate Commerce Commission has done a thing or failed to do a thing which it is considering, it must know why it did it or failed to do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; but it does not have to state it to us, Mr. Speaker, under a resolution of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we reach the Interstate Commerce Commission through the President, because the President appoints the Commission, and we can not call directly upon the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, here is a resolution asking for facts which show, or tend to show, certain things. It is true that under the rules and the precedents we can not call upon the head of a department or upon the President as to what conclusions he may reach or what reasonings he may adopt. That is for the protection both of the House and of the department, because it is not proper for the House to ask the head of a department why he does not do a thing or why he wants to do a thing. But when we call upon the head of a department for certain facts, whatever the resolution may be, it involves the use of judgment by the head of the department to determine what the facts are that we call for, unless we call for a copy of a specific paper; and in order to do that you have to determine whether this specific paper that a department has is the one that is called for. The reasoning does not apply to a case where the officer must exercise a judgment in picking out the papers which he submits.

We did not ask for any information of the President as to why the commission did or did not advance rates or why the commission has or has not acted upon this question. I do not see how there is any escape from the conclusion that the resolution only calls for facts, and I again call the attention of the Speaker to a ruling which the Speaker made upon the resolution concerning the cost of the Philippine Islands to the Government. There was a question involving a great many opinions on the part of the department as to whether a certain expenditure was made because we owned the Philippine Islands, or whether we would have had the expenditure if we had not owned the Philippine Islands, and the Speaker ruled that the resolution, after all, only called for information, only called for facts.

It might be a very difficult matter of judgment for the officer to determine whether the facts which were called for were these or some others. It might be a very difficult thing to determine what the facts were. But, after all, what we were calling for were the facts. The Speaker held that the resolution was privileged. I do not myself believe that such a resolution as this ought to be passed at this time, with these matters pending before the commission; but when it comes to ruling what is in order the House ought to protect itself as to its right to call upon the heads of departments for facts which are in their possession, either now or at any other time, and not waive its rights.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is not facts that are called for in this resolution.

If it were a resolution that called for the facts regarding these cases where applications were made for increases, that would be one thing. But that is not what this resolution does. It does not call for the facts, but for a certain character or class of facts, and that character and class of facts can not be stated under this resolution without giving the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, because this is the situation: This resolution asks for facts as to why they did not do a certain thing. A hundred facts may be before the commission. The commission may think that one of those facts is a sufficient ground or reason for their action or for their nonaction, and this resolution calls for a specific fact or for specific facts, as the reason why they do not act, and the very description of those facts under these circumstances constitutes a statement of the reasons or grounds.

It seems to me that this is clear, that this can not be answered by anybody, either by the President or the Interstate Commerce Commission, unless they shall state what of the facts that may be before them are in their judgment sufficient grounds for not deciding, or withholding a decision, and that, of course, calls for a decision or judgment upon the reasons, and not the facts themselves.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the remark twice that this resolution ought not to be passed. The Chair has nothing on earth to do with that. That is one thing.

The only question involved here is whether this resolution calls for facts. The House passed a resolution with precisely the same words, down to the point where the specific facts are mentioned, when Mr. Gillespie, of Texas, offered it here, with nobody raising the question, and the Chair does not believe that the House ought to be too quick in throwing away its own rights about investigating the transactions of the departments, and what is almost equivalent to one, this Interstate Commerce Commission; and he overrules the point of order against this resolution.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves to lay the resolution on the table. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands a division. Those in favor of tabling this resolution will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-five gentlemen have arisen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eight gentlemen have arisen in the negative. The ayes have it, and the motion to table the resolution is agreed to.

PRINTING FOR PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE (H. DOC. NO. 919).

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana offers a resolution and asks for its present consideration. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 477 (H. Rept. 574).

Resolved, That there shall be printed as a House document 60,000 copies of Supplement No. 10 to the Public Health Report, entitled "The Care of the Baby," 35,000 copies for the use of the Public Health Service, and 25,000 copies for the use of the House, the same to be distributed through the folding room of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I understand that these copies are to be printed for the use of the Public Health Service. I take it that the printing will be charged to the congressional printing fund and not to the printing fund of the Treasury Department?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; so I understand.

Mr. MANN. How much will they cost?

Mr. BARNHART. They will cost $291.46.

Mr. MANN. That is for the 35,000?

Mr. BARNHART. No; the 60,000 copies.

Mr. MANN. Do they not have authority to print them now in the Bureau of Public Health?

Mr. BARNHART. They have the authority to print them now, but they say they have no funds.

Mr. FOSTER. They are limited in the amount of money they have.

Mr. MANN. I did not know whether they had authority to print an unlimited edition.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they have reprints.

Mr. MANN. How will they distribute the 35,000 copies?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, a letter from the Health Bureau says that they have already printed 15,000 copies. The edition has been off the press only about 10 days, and the Public Health Bureau has received requests for the publication aggregating in number 30,000 copies. The original edition was 15,000 copies. Many of these requests have been received from Members of Congress, who ask for 25 to 500 copies each. The bureau is endeavoring to comply with all requests, at least in part, but the funds available for printing are not sufficient to meet the demand. The publication is a practical, plainly written little pamphlet, treating of the care of infants from the time of birth, and the requests that have been received for it are the strongest indorsement of its value.

Mr. MANN. Now, if the gentleman will permit, the Members of Congress have, some of them, applied for 500 copies of this pamphlet. Why should we give to the Public Health Service the copies which will go to Congressmen, instead of giving them to the House itself.

Mr. BARNHART. The reason for that is that applications to the Public Health Service have already been made for 30,000 copies.

Mr. MANN. That includes the requests of Members of Congress, some of whom have asked for 500 copies?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. They will be filled when the bureau is given the pamphlets.

Mr. FOSTER. Members of Congress would have their quota in the folding room, and then go over there and get additional copies?

Mr. MANN. What I am asking is, Why should we not decrease the number to go to the Public Health Service and increase the number which should go to the Members of the House?

Mr. BARNHART. Because in such instances those Members who want to send out the pamphlet they could be supplied on application to the Public Health Service, whereas if all are placed to the credit of Members in the folding room, half of them will never ask for their allotment, they will never be sent out, and therefore, as is too often the case, wasted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. I have already reserved the right to object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Treasury Department this year has, I believe, $340,000 for printing. It allots that printing fund to the various bureaus in the department. It has ample money to do the printing necessary. Why should any printing for any of the bureaus of the Treasury Department be done at the expense of the congressional allotment? That is an abuse, and some attempt has been made to stop it in recent years. This is a revival of an abuse for which there can be no possible excuse. If the gentlemen desires to print these bulletins and place them at the disposal of the two Houses and charge it to the congressional allotment for printing, that is one thing; but to print for the bureaus of the Government, that are given ample appropriations for their printing, and charge the additional printing to the congressional allotment, is an entirely different matter.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman says they have ample appropriations now for all their printing. The fact is that there are a great many documents issued by the Public Health Bureau that are desired by Congressmen because of the requests that come from people in the various districts, and the bureau can not furnish them because they have not sufficient means.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is because the Secretary of the Treasury does not give them the proper allotment out of the appropriation.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is possibly because Congress does not give the Secretary enough.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, we give them liberal appropriations for printing.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. There are a great many publications that we can not get from the Bureau of Public Health that are very desirable, because they have no funds with which to do the printing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the printing is to be paid for out of the allotment for printing for Congress, it ought to be placed at the disposal of Congress. If the printing is to be placed at the disposal of the department, it should be charged to the departmental appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that there is one way in which the constituents of the gentleman from Mississippi can get these publications, and that is by paying a very nominal sum for them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. A great many people can not get them in that way, because there are not enough to go round.

Mr. SHERLEY. They have the power to print whenever there is a commercial demand for them; but these people want to get something for nothing.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The people do not want them because they want to get something for nothing, but they want them because they are valuable publications and very desirable. At least, this particular publication is very desirable, and whether they are paid for out of the appropriation for printing for the Treasury Department or paid for out of the appropriation for congressional printing, they will be paid for out of the Public Treasury anyway. That question does not affect the desirability of the pamphlet, and it does not affect the fact that people get them for nothing. I take it there is nothing in that objection. What difference does it make?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does make considerable difference whether the appropriation that is made for printing for Congress is used to pay for printing for one of the departments or whether the department does the printing that it is authorized to have out of the appropriations given for that purpose.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The publications of this particular bureau are very valuable, and they go to people who require publications of this character.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they are valuable publications.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman says they already have ample funds. I do not think they have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they have, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. SHERLEY. The trouble comes in this way: The very moment you have Congress printing for departments out of its allotment, various bulletins, you put the department in the position where instead of using their funds for matters they ought to use them for they select those things they can not get Congress to appropriate for printing and leave the pressure on Congress for things that there may be a wide public demand for. The result is a great increase in the annual bill for printing. The reason I made the suggestion was that we waste more money, proportionately, in public printing, than in any other activity of the Government, and we do it because we advertise to all America that they can get various things for nothing. Then the people make demands for them without any real knowledge of what they contain, and without any knowledge of whether they wish them or not, but simply because they are free. It ought not to be a burden on the citizen who pays for it in the long run to pay a nominal sum for the thing he wants, and then he will determine whether he wants it before he requests it.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is simply making the same argument that I made when the appropriation for the Children's Bureau was up—that the departments do duplicate educational endeavor. As far as the extravagance of congressional printing is concerned, I think this is only the seventh or eighth little bill that the Committee on Printing has brought in this session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that I have not criticized the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHERLEY. Neither have I criticized the gentleman's committee.

Mr. BARNHART. I am not saying that the gentlemen have criticized the committee, I am saying that the gentleman from Kentucky has stated on the floor just what I said when the appropriation was up for the Children's Bureau, namely, that the departments are overlapping each other. But this important and helpful printing, however, I find in my own State that the State board of health has sent out a little pamphlet similar to this—other States are doubtless doing the same—and therefore I limited the number of copies to the very least number I thought might be used.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Am I right in my understanding that the estimated cost is only $291 for 35,000 copies?

Mr. BARNHART. For 60,000 copies.

Mr. MOORE. And one-half to go to the Public Health Service would cost $146. May I ask the gentleman, who has children of his own, as I have, whether it would not be worth $291 if only the life of one child was saved through the distribution of the 60,000 pamphlets?

Mr. BARNHART. Most assuredly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to say that I have more children than the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Indiana put together.

Mr. BARNHART. I am not a boastful man. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. So far as the "gentleman from Pennsylvania" is concerned, he does not acknowledge that the gentleman from New York is a rival in that matter at all, and never did acknowledge it. But having passed through several periods of "watchful waiting" [laughter], long midnight hours, as it were, he knows that if there had been at his service some of these pamphlets he might have been spared a great deal of time and saved a great deal of rest. In the interest of the fathers and mothers of this land, the gentleman from Pennsylvania ventures to think it is mighty small business to raise the question of economy on the expenditure of $291 in a matter that is of so much concern to the health of the children and the happiness of the home.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say that if this expenditure would save the gentleman from Pennsylvania long hours of patient waiting and midnight walking the floors and would enable the gentleman to take on some flesh, I would not object. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; I will.

Mr. SHARP. I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not be the better part of wisdom and economy to provide a small appropriation of $291 for this purpose than to waste twice that amount in useless talk?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to put the question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. BARNHART), as follows:

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 477) providing for the printing as a House document Supplement No. 10 to the Public Health Report, entitled "The Care of the Baby," reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $291.46.

The unencumbered balance of the allotment for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, is $314,996.67.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the words "thirty-five thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "ten thousand," and to strike out "twenty-five thousand" and insert "fifty thousand," so that 10,000 copies will be for the Public Health Service and 50,000 for the House. I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say that the Public Health Service had large demands from Members of the House for copies. If the printing is not to be done at the expense of the allotment of that service, but of the congressional allotment, it seems to me that the copies should be for the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, strike out the word "thirty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten"; line 5, strike out the word "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CHARLES ALLEN SMITH.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD on Charles Allen Smith, a young sailor from Philadelphia, who was killed at Vera Cruz.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the death of Charles Allen Smith, reported by the Navy Department as having occurred at Vera Cruz, due possibly to a Mexican bullet fired from the housetops, adds to the roll of the Nation's heroes a second Philadelphian sacrificed in the service of his country. This young man resided in Kensington. Like George Poinsett, to whom I referred briefly on Wednesday last, he had just passed his twentieth bithday. He was truly representative of the spirit of the Navy. He had been in the service since August 31, 1911. During that time from the small stipend received from the Government he had contributed regularly to the support of his mother and his three minor sisters. Indeed, he was a prop to a family bereft of the husband and father, and his death, apart from the patriotic impulses which inspired it, brings positive distress upon the home he was helping to support. I have no further comment to make at this time except to say that although we are enlisted for the war and must maintain the honor of this country at any cost we should not be unmindful of its terrors and the desolation and distress it brings in individual cases like this.

IDEAL CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered by Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK, on April 15, 1914, before the Oglethorpe Club, of Savannah, Ga., upon the subject of ideal citizenship.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] at Savannah, Ga., on the subject of ideal citizenship. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speech referred to is as follows:

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS W. HARDWICK, OF GEORGIA, AT THE ANNUAL BANQUET OF THE CRACKER CLUB, OF SAVANNAH, GA., ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1914.

Mr. Toastmaster and gentlemen, first of all, permit me to express to the officers and members of this club my very high appreciation of your invitation to be your guest this evening, and my very great pleasure at having been able to accept that invitation.

When you asked me to this beautiful and historic Georgia city, the splendid birthplace of our mighty Commonwealth, I felt that you were in deed and in truth inviting me home, and when my foot pressed your kindly soil on my arrival here this morning the same emotions stirred my heart and shook my soul that McGregor felt when he stood once more upon his native heath.

It has fallen to my lot, during the somewhat lengthy period of my public service, to make more public addresses in other sections of our country than I have made in the South, possibly because I have generally been on the firing line, and the Democratic Party has needed help more in other sections of the country than in ours; be that as it may, what I started out to tell you was this: Often I have been warned, usually in the most delicate and diplomatic manner, by friends in these other sections not to say too much about the South. It has not been easy for me to pay very much attention to these suggestions, for you had just as well tell the lion not to suggest in his roar the solitary forest jungle in which he dwells; you had just as well tell the eagle not to suggest in his scream the crag on which his nest is built, bleak, lonely, and barren though it be; you had just as well tell the mocking bird not to suggest in his song the sunny skies in which his life is spent, as to tell a true son of the South not to say something about Dixie land, especially if he is a long ways from home.

You may well surmise, then, the especial pleasure that I experience in addressing this audience and the peculiar satisfaction with which I, a genuine "Georgia Cracker" to the manor born, have accepted the suggestion that I shall to-night respond to the toast "The Georgia Cracker."

Before I undertake a discussion of the "Georgia Cracker" himself I would like to invite your attention briefly to the imperial domain that he inhabits—the largest State, territorially or otherwise, east of the Mississippi, and the biggest and best of them all, the great State of Georgia; to her mighty mountains, that stand like huge sentinels of granite and rock along her northern boundaries; to her great rivers, that flow in majesty to greet ocean and gulf along a coast line where the sunshine is eternal and where the roses never wither and the violets never cease to bloom; to her famous and luscious fruits that have invaded and conquered every market; to her endless rows of cotton, whiter than New England's snows and freighted with an annual treasure richer than the fabled fleece that Jason sought; to the flawless marble that sleeps beneath her sod; and to the everlasting granite with which her red old hills are ribbed.

It is indeed an imperial domain, an empire in and of itself, bounteously dowered by nature and richly blessed by nature's God. It is, in truth, a goodly heritage, worthy of the splendid manhood and incomparable womanhood that it has produced.

What of the "Georgia Cracker" himself? What pen or voice is equal to the task of presenting a word portrait of him that will do full justice to the subject? It is with both diffidence and misgiving that I essay it. It seems to me that, wherever he lives, whatever he does, however he looks, he has certain general traits of character that are both notable and noteworthy. In the first place, he is shrewd; the man who picks him for a fool has another guess coming. He usually knows what he wants and how to get it. Of course, occasionally he makes a mistake; once in a while he is picked up; sometimes a new trick catches him, but never the second time. A stranger may impose on his good nature and his generosity, but not but once. An artful demagogue may deceive him, but not but once. A new fad may come along and sweep him from his feet, but not for long. He has dead loads of good common horse sense and a quaint philosophy that enables him to weigh with considerable accuracy both men and events.

In the next place, he is honest to the core, and on weekdays as well as on Sundays. He abhors the short yard and the scant pound. He pays his debt if it takes his last dollar, his last pound of cotton, his last ear of corn. He is not only financially honest, but mentally honest as well, for he despises sham and has the utmost contempt for deceit.

Then, again, he is brave, both physically and morally brave; he has demonstrated it on every battlefield in the Republic, in every war that we have had, and he has proved it still more conclusively in peace by the dauntless courage with which he resurrected his civilization from the horrors and ashes of the bloodiest civil war that ever devastated this earth and by the indomitable Anglo-Saxon spirit in which and with which he has met and solved the most stupendous race problem that ever confronted a people. He bends the knee to nothing on this earth or in the waters below it or the heavens above it save the woman he loves and the God he worships.

Then, again, this "Georgia Cracker" is patriotic. He loves his country with his whole heart, his whole mind, and his whole strength. True, it is a love that begins at home. He loves, first of all, the city and county in which he resides; then the great Commonwealth of Georgia, the old mother State; then this dear Southland of ours, with which and for which he suffered so much; and then last, but not least, this glorious American Republic, that has been so largely built upon the sacrifices and blood offerings of his fathers. He is at last back in the house of his fathers, in the Union of the States, but, thank God, he is there with no sackcloth on his back or ashes on his head; he is there not as a subject but as a citizen, not as a menial but as a master. True, there are some things in our past history that he can never forget. He can never forget that when it was no longer possible for a proud and self-respecting people to continue to endure the oppressions of an hostile ministry and a tyrannical king, it was the matchless eloquence of a great southern orator, the incomparable Henry, that lit those fires of resistance that were borne on the morning winds of the new-born continent to its remotest confines to light a nation into life. He can never forget that when a decent respect for the opinion of mankind impelled our fathers to declare the causes that led them to separate their political destinies from those of the British Crown that it was the glorious, genius-tipped pen of a great southern statesman, the immortal Jefferson, that drafted that unanswerable recital of our wrongs and that fearless declaration of our rights that became the birth certificate of a mighty nation. He can never forget that when the work of southern orators and southern statesmen was done and a mighty nation closed up its ranks and stood in battle array to assert its rights and redress its wrongs and its assembled councilors sought a chieftain who, like Saul of Israel, should tower head and shoulders above all his fellows, the choice fell upon that illustrious and immortal son of the South destined to become the "Father of his Country."

He can never forget that when the Federal Constitution, the greatest written chart of human liberty the world has ever seen, was framed, southern statesmanship was so deeply woven into its warp and woof that by universal acclaim the title "Father of the Constitution" was bestowed upon the scholarly Madison. He can never forget that while New England was plotting disunion and threatening treason at her Hartford convention, during the War of 1812, the South was beating her drums and calling the muster rolls of her volunteers, and that during that same war while northern generals were meeting one reverse after another along the Canadian border glorious old Andy Jackson was winning victories at Pensacola and New Orleans.

He can never forget that for the Mexican War the South furnished, in proportion to wealth and population, two dollars for every one, and three men for every one, that came from the North. He can never forget that in the Civil War itself we were not overcome by better generalship or braver soldiery, but by money, numbers, and supplies.

No; he can forget none of these things, nor is it necessary that he should, for he at last realizes, as does his brother at the North, that in the inscrutable providence of an all-wise God this chastening of the American people was necessary in order that they might know each other better and respect each other more, and upon the broad and lasting foundations of mutual knowledge and mutual respect erect the splendid superstructure of a new and mightier Republic, whose strength should exceed that of the old even as the strength of mature manhood exceeds that of raw and undeveloped youth, and whose glory should excel that of the old, even as the glory of the noonday sun excels that of the morning star.

One other thought, Mr. Toastmaster and gentlemen, in connection with the Georgia Cracker.

In the State of Georgia and throughout the South there lives to-day the most homogeneous white population in the entire Union. In Georgia 99.4 per cent of our population is native born, sprung from our own soil, acquainted with the traditions and history of our country, attached to its principles, loyal to its institutions, and American to the very core.

To add to the sum of our felicities in this matter it can be truthfully said of the inconsiderable proportion of our citizenry that is foreign born that as a whole and in most cases it is composed of men of high character, men who have readily assimilated with us, and who love the State of Georgia and the Republic and are useful and loyal citizens of both. That we are unusually fortunate in this regard can not be gainsaid by anyone who is acquainted with conditions in other and less fortunate sections of our country. Let us examine briefly the official reports as contained in the census of 1910.

First, let us start on the banks of the Potomac and go straight through the very heart of the South to the banks of the Rio Grande. What do we find? We find that in Virginia only 0.9 per cent of the entire population is foreign born; in North Carolina, 0.3 per cent; in South Carolina, 0.04 per cent; Georgia, 0.6 per cent; Alabama, 0.9 per cent; Mississippi, 0.5 per cent; Louisiana, 3.2 per cent; Texas, 6.2 per cent, an average of 1.6 per cent for the above-named States. If we take the 11 States that formed the Southern Confederacy, we find that the average per cent of foreign-born population in them is 1.8 per cent. Turn for a moment to other sections of this country and what do we find?

We find 11 great States—3 in New England, 2 in the Middle Atlantic group, and 6 in the Northwest and in the far West—where the percentage of foreign-born population is so large as to be appalling. Let me give you the list of these States with their percentages:

	Per cent.
Rhode Island	33.
Massachusetts	31. 5
New York	30. 2
Connecticut	29. 6
North Dakota	27. 1
Minnesota	26. 2
New Jersey	26.
Montana	25. 2
California	24. 7
Nevada	24 .1
Arizona	23. 9

An average for these States of 27.4 per cent. According to the same authority the average percentage of the foreign-born population of the New England States is 27.9 per cent; of the Middle Atlantic States, 25.1 per cent; of the Pacific States, 22.8 per cent.

It must be remembered, also, that these figures do not include citizens born on this soil of foreign parentage. I have not been able to find the official figures on this question reduced to the percentage basis, but in addition to the population in this country that is of foreign birth, the reports show that 18,897,837 are born of foreign parentage besides 13,343,583 of foreign birth. In the State of Georgia, however, we have only 25,672 citizens of foreign parentage, as against 1,391,058 born of native white parentage, and the other Southern States maintain almost as good an average on this question as does Georgia.

Such is the situation. These are the conditions that confront us, as disclosed by official reports of the Government. I do not advert to it in either alarming style or sensational fashion. Nothing is further from my purpose. I have full, yea, overflowing, sympathy with the noble idea that this great country of ours should afford to the oppressed and virtuous of every land an asylum of refuge from persecution and injustice. I acknowledge in ungrudging measure the great debt of gratitude we owe to those people of other and less fortunate lands who have sought and found a happier home in ours, giving generously of their brain and brawn to the progress and prosperity of the Republic, renouncing all conflicting allegiances to become true and loyal American citizens. To such men—and I thank God that the vast majority of our southern citizens of foreign birth or lineage can be so classified—no man can extend a heartier welcome than I; but I can not be insensible, nor can you, to the dangers involved in the situation. Because we welcome the worthy and virtuous from every land, where they are capable of assimilation with our own people, I do not believe that we can afford to welcome here the scum of the earth from every land, who come to this country not to become a part of it, but to strip it bare, to take the bread of labor from American mouths and to carry back in triumph to some foreign shore the spoils of their brief sojourn among us. Nor can I be insensible to the grave danger to our American system of Government that is involved in the continued and increasing influx of these classes of foreigners. They know nothing of American history, they care nothing for American traditions, and they are without sympathy for American institutions. In large part they do not speak and can not learn our language. They come here filled with all sorts of socialistic, anarchistic, and nihilistic ideas, impatient of all restraints imposed by law, and utterly and supremely indifferent to the welfare of that country in which they propose to linger only long enough to make enough money to support them in comfort elsewhere. It fell to my lot on one occasion to have all these truths impressed on my mind with startling force. It was on the occasion when the Committee on Rules of your House of Representatives investigated the great strike at Lawrence, Mass., in 1912. I gave my undivided attention to that inquiry and conducted a considerable portion of it myself for the committee.

When all the evidence was in it presented a picture of strong and contrasting lights and of startling significance. It was apparent that the poor people engaged in that strike, however guilty they might have been of riot, disorder, and lawbreaking, had suffered grievous wrongs and oppression from the driving slave masters in whose interest they had been induced to leave their own countries by the glowing pictures of the American laboring man returning home at night from his day of toil with a bag of gold upon his shoulder, as some of them testified. But an examination of the witnesses disclosed that the minds of them all were filled to the brim with socialistic, anarchistic, un-American ideas. It appeared that there was almost endless variety of nationality among them and probably the greatest confusion of tongues since the day when the tower of Babel fell. So that when the climax of their bitter wrongs came they appealed not to the law and authorities of this country but to the ministers and consuls of at least 16 foreign nations. Here is where the problem presses hardest. These poor men were not then, and had no notion of becoming, American citizens. They had no place in this country; they did not belong here; they were simply brought here in droves and swarms in order that selfish and short-sighted capital might fatten on their labor while it turned a deaf ear to their wrongs and sorrows. They were unassimilated and undigested, and incapable of assimilation or digestion into our body politic.

Fellow Georgians, I have almost done. Let me say, from 12 years' experience and close observation at the political nerve center of the Republic, that I am convinced that the people of this country are confronting a crisis that challenges their very capacity for self-government. The issues that are forcing themselves upon us rise far above party, far above State and section. They involve the very life of our American system of government, that splendid system of government that more than inspired our own great Hill to his most brilliant flights of eloquence. Hear him to-night as he eulogizes it, "To him who loves liberty it is more enchanting than romance, more bewitching than love, and more elevating than the study of any other science." Hear him as he exclaims, "The snows that fall on Mount Washington are not purer than the motives which begot it; the fresh dew-laden zephyrs from the orange groves of the South are not sweeter than the hopes its advent inspired, and the flight of our own symbolic eagle, though he blow his breath on the sun, can not be higher than its expected destiny."

This system of government that the great Georgian so eloquently and so justly eulogized is the American system, our system; it is the best product of the minds and brains of your fathers and of mine, generously watered with their blood and sanctified by their sufferings. It is the system of liberty without license, of power without oppression, of strength without arrogance. It is the system of unified power for general and foreign purposes and of local self-government in local affairs. It is the system of coordinated powers, of checks and balances, of representative, orderly, free government. It is the system of individual opportunity and of civil and religious liberty, for it guarantees to every citizen of the Republic the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience and to follow his own path in the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness so long as his course does not injure others. It is the system in which the individual citizen is the crowned and anointed king, and in which the laws are framed so power shall flow from the citizen down to his government and not from the government down to its subject.

I love it with all my heart and soul, and for that reason I tell you to-night that in the great ocean of our national life strange and terrifying currents are swirling; strange blood from other lands, in far too great quantity and of at least doubtful quality, has been injected into our body politic. Too many, ah, too vastly many, of these men know nothing and care less for the American system, for the American standard, for American ideals. They have brought with them from over the seas new and strange heresies that threaten to sweep us from our old and tried moorings into new and dangerous doctrines of paternalism and socialism. Do not misunderstand me; I am as progressive as anybody in this Union in demanding that the era of special privilege shall cease; as insistent as anybody, in any party, in demanding the restoration of competitive conditions and individual opportunity, but I shall never move an inch, whether in public life or private station, along the path that leads to the substitution of public monopoly for private monopoly. To my mind both forms of monopoly are equally intolerable and equally indefensible. If the Democratic Party is to remain true to its faith, loyal to its cardinal doctrines and principles; if the Union of the States is to preserve and retain the American system of Government, under which it has grown to be the greatest and richest and most powerful Nation of the earth, then I tell you to-night the saving grace must come from the South, the home of the purest blooded American people in the Republic, the last citadel of the old-time stock, and in the very vanguard of the host that must battle for the Government of our fathers, for representative government, for liberty, and for individualism, must stand the Georgia Cracker; and if, perchance, the future trials that God has ordained for this people shall demand, in the hour of gravest need, some leader with the unselfish patriotism of a Washington, the deep philosophy of a Jefferson, and the dauntless courage of a Jackson, the country may turn again for such leadership to the southern portion of the Republic, the cradle of its liberties, the nursery of its early greatness.

CHICKASAW AND CHOCTAW INDIANS.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the enrollment in the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes of Indians.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the enrollment of the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FLOODS IN MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 458 (H. Rept. 573).

Resolved, That the following reports—

First. Report of Bernard and Totten, 1822, House Document No. 35, Seventeenth Congress, second session;

Second. Report of Charles Ellet, jr., 1852, Senate Executive Document No. 20, Thirty-second Congress; first session; and

Third. Report of Gen. A. A. Humphreys, 1866, Senate Executive Document No. 8, Fortieth Congress, first session—relative to the control of floods in the Mississippi River be reprinted as one pamphlet for the use of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What would be the expense of this?

Mr. BARNHART. Four hundred and ninety-five dollars.

Mr. MANN. This would be printed in the usual manner. It is provided that it shall be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know any way of doing that unless the number be specified. If it is to be printed as a House document, then it would be printed in the ordinary form as a House document, and we would get a certain quota and the Senate would get a certain quota, but there is no number specified in the resolution and the Public Printer would not know what to do with it. If the gentleman just wants to have it printed, it better read "printed as a House document."

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, then I move to amend the resolution by inserting in line 12 the words "as a House document" in lieu of the words "for the use of the House."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 12, strike out the words "for the use of the House" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as a House document," so that the line would read:

"Reprinted as one pamphlet as a House document."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. What would be the number printed?

Mr. BARNHART. That would be 1,361, under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARNHART, from the Committee on Printing, makes the following report (to accompany H. Res. 458):

"The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 458) providing for the printing as a House document the reports of Bernard and Totten, Charles Ellet, jr., and Gen. A. A. Humphreys, relative to the control of floods in the Mississippi River, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

"The estimated cost will be $495.

"The unincumbered balance of the allotment for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, is $329,996."

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that motion is not in order. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor, and if the gentleman from Oregon desires time he should get it from the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, then I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield me three minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Before I yield the gentleman from Oregon three minutes I yield the same time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I had not thought it would be necessary to consume any time. Does the gentleman from Oregon desire to get information with respect to the particular documents that are to be printed?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Oh, I have no intention of opposing the resolution; but I desire to address myself to the subject of printing generally.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, certain newspapers in New York and elsewhere have recently complained that the congressional franking privilege is a graft and that it ought to be abolished. Let us see what the facts are. A Congressman or Senator having a speech or report printed for distribution in his district must bear all the expense of such printing. He must give the Public Printer a check on his private funds for such cost. My bill at the Government Printing Office the past three years has been a good part of my salary. The only thing the Government donates is the postal frank. I am perfectly willing that this postal frank be abolished, provided Congress will pass a law giving to Members and Senators the same postal rates that are now enjoyed by the same newspapers that are now complaining of the "congressional franking graft." The big daily newspapers only pay 1 cent a pound for sending out their papers, or $20 a ton. If Congress will give me those same terms I can send a speech to each voter in my district for from $20 to $40 postage, which cost would be negligible. Besides getting a rate of $20 a ton, which is less than the transcontinental freight rate, the newspapers may send their papers by mail anywhere in the county of publication, except at city delivery offices, free of any postage. Furthermore, the speeches of a Congressman or Senators are delayed in transmission, as deadhead matter, while newspapers go by fast mail. My speeches recently sent to Portland were delayed 10 days on this account. I should have preferred to pay the same insignificant 1 cent a pound that the newspapers pay and had my speeches delivered on time. But what the newspapers would like to see required of a Congressman is that he pay first-class postage on his speeches, or 100 times as much as the newspapers pay. The newspapers desire to be the only means of communication between the National Legislature and the people. The newspapers would then be able to mold public opinion completely and run the Government according to their own selfish ends. The public is waking up to its rights. Hereafter the newspapers will be servants rather than the self-appointed bosses of the country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

GENERAL DATA ON LAKE SUPERIOR-MISSISSIPPI RIVER CANAL.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 460 (H. Rept. 575).

Resolved, That there shall be printed as a House document 1,800 copies of a report made by Government Engineers C. L. Potter, F. R. Shunk, and E. D. Peck, and designated as General Data on Lake Superior-Mississippi River Canal.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing having had under consideration the House resolution (H. Res. 460) providing for the printing as a House document the report made by Government Engineers C. L. Potter, F. R. Shunk, and E. D. Peck, and designated as General Data on Lake Superior-Mississippi River Canal, reports the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The estimated cost will be $144.18.

The unincumbered balance of the allotment for printing and binding for Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, is $329,996.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. GEORGE was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be heard for 5 or 10 minutes in explanation of my introduction of the privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes to give the reasons why he introduced his resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objected.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to withhold the objection for a moment.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes, just to explain——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is trying to bring up his resolution and have a discussion on matters now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

VOLUNTEER ARMY BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill known as the Volunteer Army bill, H. R. 7138, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up the Volunteer Army bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to explain——

Mr. HAY. I will answer any question the gentleman desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 569).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 5, 7, and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 6, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided further, That when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of any company, troop, or battery, or when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of each company, troop, or battery comprised in any battalion or regiment of the organized land militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, organized as prescribed by law and War Department regulations, shall volunteer and be accepted for service in the Volunteer Army as such company, troop, battery, battalion, or regiment, such organization may be received into the volunteer forces in advance of other organizations of the same arm or class from the same State, Territory, or District, and the officers in the organized land militia service with such organization may then, within the limits prescribed by law, be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of corresponding grades in the Volunteer Army and be assigned to the same grades in the said organizations or elsewhere as the President may direct"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES HAY,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

G. M. HITCHCOCK,
LUKE LEA,
H. A. DU PONT,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

A statement on the part of the managers of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 7138) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

Senate amendment 1 inserts the words "while in the service of the United States" in section 1 of the bill, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 2 changes the enlistment period and makes it four years instead of for the war, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 3 provides for the volunteering of the Organized Militia, and the House recedes with an amendment making clearer the conditions under which this can be done.

Senate amendment 4 strikes out the words "to promotion or" in the section defining the respective rights of the Volunteer and Regular forces, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 5 changes the method of selecting the number of volunteer staff officers, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 6 provides for filling temporary vacancies in the staff corps, and the House recedes.

Senate amendment 7 adds a new section to the bill providing for discharge of volunteer officers, and the Senate recedes.

Senate amendment 8 changes the number of the section, and the Senate recedes.

JAMES HAY,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will answer any questions.

Mr. MANN. Would not the gentleman, in view of the situation, be kind enough to state to the House not merely the amendments proposed but just how we increase our Volunteer Army by the bill itself, briefly, so we will all have it?

Mr. MURDOCK. And if the gentleman will explain in detail just what the difference is in amendment numbered 3 as agreed to by the conferees from what it is as carried as an amendment in the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. And also may I call the attention of the chairman to amendment numbered 2 and ask him to explain the reason for that change?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, this bill provides the mode by which the President, when authorized by Congress upon a declaration of war, can call out the Volunteer forces of the country. The mode of doing so is the same as that which has been heretofore made in the law except that in this case the President himself signs the commission of all officers instead of their being appointed by the governors of the States.

It was the experience in the Spanish War that a great deal of abuse was occasioned by reason of the political influences brought to bear upon governors of States for appointment in the Volunteer forces. This bill also provides how the Organized Militia—and that is an answer I will try to make to what the gentleman from Kansas desires—how the Organized Militia of the country may have the first call, as it were. It provides that when three-fourths of the minimum strength of any company, troop, battery, battalion, or regiment enlists or volunteers and is accepted, that they shall be taken in in advance of the other volunteers, thus providing that the organized troops, those who have had the advantage of being drilled and have had the advantage of experience, shall first be taken in before untried men who have not had this advantage.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I think the first amendment to the bill did. Now, what does this other agreement to amendment 3 do in addition to that?

Mr. HAY. Well, it does not do anything in addition to that. It simply made clear that these troops had to be accepted by the United States before they were taken, for the reason that under the amendment adopted by the Senate if they volunteered they had to be taken in whether they were physically fit or not.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HAY. And therefore the conferees thought it was absolutely necessary, in order to protect the Government in case of pensions and other matters of that sort, that they should be accepted by the Government before they should be allowed to volunteer. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman refers to the manner of commissioning officers. He does not mean the appointment?

Mr. HAY. Yes. I mean the officers of this force are to be commissioned by the President of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not finished the question yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KAHN. If my colleague will allow me to suggest there, I believe the bill provides he shall issue the commission upon the recommendation of the governor.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was a question I was going to ask. Of course, this virtually means the calling in of the militia of the various States, does it not?

Mr. HAY. It means the calling in of the militia, and the militia in the sense of the Constitution is all the men who are of military age in the country.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that. Now, the gentleman knows, of course, that the appointment of the officers of that force is by the Constitution reserved to the States?

Mr. HAY. No; I do not. There is a very great distinction between the Organized Militia and the Volunteers.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I wanted the gentleman to explain.

Mr. HAY. The Organized Militia of the State can not be called into the service of the United States as such to go beyond the confines of the United States under the Constitution. Therefore this bill provides a way by which the Organized Militia can volunteer and become Volunteers. And the Volunteers are entirely different from the members of the Organized Militia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Therefore the gentleman is confident that this bill, as he has drawn it and as it is sought to be agreed to by this amendment, will not conflict with the rights of the States appointing the officers in the militia?

Mr. HAY. In the Organized Militia; not at all.

Mr. HELVERING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HELVERING. Do I understand that they will be known as United States Volunteers or known as State Volunteers?

Mr. HAY. They will be United States Volunteers. They will volunteer into the service of the United States.

Mr. HELVERING. Then they will not be designated as certain regiments of Kansas and Missouri, and so forth?

Mr. HAY. Oh, they could designate them as "such and such" volunteer regiment of Kansas—"the Fifteenth Regiment," for example.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to relieve the mind of a constituent of mine, a man celebrated in military affairs, Gen. W. G. Price, who has spent a life among the military men of Pennsylvania? He is very anxious about this bill. It would confer no higher authority upon the President to accept the military organization beyond the size of a battalion?

Mr. HAY. A regiment.

Mr. BUTLER. He may now accept a regiment?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman answer another question for me? The first military organization to be accepted, if we need them, will be the regular Organized Militia?

Mr. HAY. If the volunteers can comply with the requirements of the law.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will be patient with me a minute, in order that I may understand, I would like to ask, if this bill passes it would authorize these men to go beyond the territorial limits of the United States?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Then they will accept, under those conditions, the Organized Militia as now organized, officers and men?

Mr. HAY. No; they will accept the Organized Militia as now organized if three-fourths of the minimum enlisted strength of any organization up to and including a regiment shall volunteer——

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. Will they then accept the officers?

Mr. HAY. There is nothing in the law which requires the President to do so, but I have no question but that the President of the United States would commission the officers of any organization which volunteered under those conditions.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, again, after the privilege is given to the Organized Militia to volunteer to go beyond our boundaries, after that is exhausted they go after what is known as volunteers?

Mr. HAY. No. They are the volunteers, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. They are just simply giving to the Organized Militia the privileg. of volunteering first, and being taken first, before any other volunteers shall be taken from any State or Territory.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And permitted to volunteer as an organization?

Mr. HAY. As an organization under the requirements of the statute.

Mr. BUTLER. Then that would not cover an independent organization beyond the State militia, would it?

Mr. HAY. You mean independent of the Organized Militia?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAY. It would not.

Mr. BUTLER. This is only to cover, then, the State militia?

Mr. HAY. The Organized State Militia.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice, beginning on page 1, that the House had a provision that an enlistment in the volunteer forces shall be for a period terminating with the war, or, if war shall not occur, past the imminence of war, and the Senate added that the term of these enlistments should be four years. So I wanted to know the reasons why, if I could.

Mr. HAY. The House conferees and the House committee were strongly of the opinion that the enlistment should be for the war. It was thought that the experience and history of this country showed that it was better for men to volunteer for the war or to enlist for the war rather than for a definite period. The Senate conferees took the position that we ought to conform, as far as possible, to the requirements of the Regular Army, and as the enlistment period for the Regular Army was four years, they thought that we ought to make the period for the enlistment of these volunteers four years.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say this: If volunteer forces should be taken into the Army, and men should volunteer, and war was in existence, and that war should terminate within 30 days, these men would be held for four years?

Mr. HAY. No. The bill specifically provides that they shall be mustered out as soon as practicable, and that will be a part of their contract.

Mr. FOSTER. But it does not keep them there for four years unless war actually exists for four years?

Mr. HAY. Oh, yes. That is correct. Now I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. I have a telegram here from an officer of the Organized Militia, in which he asks this question:

> Will the passage of the Volunteer Army bill, reported out of conference yesterday, eliminate the Organized Militia for war use and eventually obviate the necessity for maintaining State organizations in time of peace? It will also be an injustice to the present Organized Militia and the officers and the enlisted men who look forward to service in time of war.

Now, this bill when it was before the committee, as I remember it, did not provide for the organization of the volunteer forces until after the Organized Militia had been called into service.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman will remember that when the bill was before the committee and when the bill passed the House it did not give to the Organized Militia any preference over any other volunteers; but the Senate amended the bill by providing that when three-fourths of the minimum strength of any of those organizations should volunteer they should be received in advance of other volunteers; and the amendment agreed to in conference does not in any way interfere with that principle.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, there is one more question. I observe, on page 3, in line 17, this provision:

> That when the raising of a volunteer force shall have been authorized by Congress, and after the organized land militia of any arm or class shall have been called into the military service of the United States, volunteers of that particular arm or class may be raised and accepted into said service in accordance with the terms of this act regardless of the extent to which other arms or classes of said militia shall have been called into said service.

Now, let us consider what the effect would be, for instance, in the State of Pennsylvania, with 10,000 Organized Militia, embracing 14 regiments. According to the language of this bill it would appear that none of the volunteer forces could be called for until after the Organized Militia have been called into the service, but the language of the last two or three lines is:

> Regardless of the extent to which other arms or classes of said militia shall have been called into said service.

Suppose, then, that 1 regiment of those 14 that are now organized should be called in. Could they then organize the "volunteer forces" without calling in the other 13 regiments?

Mr. HAY. Not under this bill. If the gentleman will permit me, as I understand it, if the President calls for troops, or calls for volunteers, I should say—say he calls for 250,000 volunteers, and the quota of Pennsylvania under that bill would be 21,000, and you have 15,000 Organized Militia; as I understand it, if those bodies of Organized Militia volunteer, under the requirements of this act they would be first taken in before the 6,000 additional men are received.

Mr. HULINGS. I understand; and that was my former understanding of it. But how about this language that I have read that they can volunteer and then be accepted in the service without reference to the extent to which other classes of said militia shall be called into service? How about that?

Mr. HAY. That applies to classes of volunteers.

Mr. HULINGS. Then I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that the Organized Militia will first be called. After they are called, if the number is not sufficient, then this bill authorizes the organization of what is called the "volunteer forces." Is that right?

Mr. HAY. That is correct; yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish the gentleman to be patient with me, because I am not trained in military affairs.

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. I believe that presently in this country the cry "On to Mexico City!" will begin. I am willing to leave the strategy of this campaign to the Army, but I want to find out just what this bill does. This measure provides the manner in which the President can call for volunteers. It does not authorize him to call for volunteers?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no. He can not call for volunteers until the Congress has declared war.

Mr. MURDOCK. In case our Army should start for Mexico City and it should be found that Gen. Funston's forces were not sufficient, or not thought to be sufficient, to go to the City of Mexico—although he has as many men as Gen. Scott had—and Gen. Scott made the trip easily, as I believe Gen. Funston can—then under this bill the President could call for volunteers?

Mr. HAY. Not unless the Congress first authorized it.

Mr. MURDOCK. We would first have to authorize it?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And in that authorization we would fix the number of men?

Mr. HAY. No; the President fixes the number of men. After we authorize him to call out the volunteers he determines how many he will call out.

Mr. MURDOCK. Should the call be made, the Regular Army would be already engaged?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under this bill would the State militia organizations volunteer their services and have the preference over other volunteer organizations?

Mr. HAY. They would if they came within the provisions of the law.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then the State militia generally would fill up the quota?

Mr. HAY. It would depend on how many the President would call. If he called for 250,000 men the present Organized State Militia would not suffice. There are only 118,000 Organized Militia now in the country, or about that, so that you would see you have a very large number—one hundred and thirty-odd thousand volunteers—to raise outside of the Organized Militia.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, if a militia regiment in Kansas, for example, would present itself, it would have a preference over a volunteer organization that was not State militia?

Mr. HAY. Exactly.

Mr. MURDOCK. After the Kansas militia had volunteered and had been taken into the forces of the United States as a volunteer regiment, and then another regiment, not State militia, should volunteer and be taken in, what would be the difference in the status of the officers of the two organizations? In the first instance, the officers are already serving. They have been appointed by the governor. Would they be recommissioned by the President of the United States?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And would it be mandatory on the part of the department, therefore, to take the militia regiment?

Mr. HAY. It is; and there would be no difference whatever between the officers as to standing, or privileges, or anything else.

Mr. KAHN. Except in priority of commission.

Mr. HAY. That is all.

Mr. MURDOCK. In the case of the second volunteer regiment, which had not been a State militia regiment, would its officers be appointed in the first instance by the governor of the State?

Mr. HAY. No; they would be commissioned by the President of the United States.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the governor would have nothing to do with it?

Mr. HAY. Nothing to do with it except to recommend; that is all.

Mr. MURDOCK. In the case of which we have been talking, the first regiment of volunteers would come from the State militia?

The second regiment to which I have referred would not come from the State militia. What proportion of those officers named by the President could be officers detailed from the Regular Army?

Mr. HAY. There is a provision in the bill for the detailing of not more than four Regular Army officers to any one regiment.

Mr. MURDOCK. The President, then, could appoint Regular Army officers to both of these volunteer regiments?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but he could not appoint more than four Regular Army officers to any one regiment.

Mr. MURDOCK. In the case of the State militia officers originally appointed by the governor and recommissioned by the President, are their rights to promotion under this bill the same as those of Regular Army officers?

Mr. HAY. They are.

Mr. TEMPLE. I should like to inquire about the process of transforming the Organized Militia into volunteer forces. Preparatory to asking the question, I should like to state first that I notice that the amendment inserted on page 3 is modified by the conference report.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What line?

Mr. TEMPLE. Page 3, line 8. The amendment as printed in the bill is as follows:

And the officers in service with such organizations may then be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of corresponding grades in the Volunteer Army and be assigned to the same grades in the said organizations.

Now, I notice that the amendment as modified by the conference report provides that these officers may be assigned to the same grades in the said organizations——

Or elsewhere, as the President may direct.

Is it intended that the Organized Militia may be brought into the service of the United States, and then the officers taken away from their own regiments and scattered elsewhere?

Mr. HAY. I do not think it is intended to do that; but it is certainly necessary to give the President the power to transfer his officers anywhere he pleases. Therefore that provision was inserted there, so that the President could have complete control over the officers of the volunteer forces, as well as over those of the Regular Army.

Mr. TEMPLE. Then, an officer who would apply for a commission would not be applying for a commission in any particular regiment?

Mr. HAY. No; a man would apply for a commission as colonel, and when he was commissioned as colonel it would be for the President to say where he should serve.

Mr. TEMPLE. He might be assigned to his own regiment, or he might be assigned to service elsewhere?

Mr. HAY. He might be assigned to service elsewhere.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The chairman of the committee, in answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], has answered one question which I desired to ask. If I understood him correctly, although the officers of the organized land militia would ordinarily go with the volunteer regiments which had been militia regimenfs, of course, as the chairman has explained, it must be left to the President in his option to assign them to such duty as he pleases. However, the chairman assures the committee that the officers of these organized units would under ordinary circumstances go with their companies and regiments as now organized.

Mr. HAY. I think so. I can not speak for the President, but that would be common sense.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to ask the chairman of the committee the meaning of the words—

And such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize.

Does that mean such numbers as Congress may authorize?

Mr. HAY. No; as I said a moment ago, the Congress authorizes the President to make the call for volunteers, and then the President determines how many volunteers he will call into the service.

Mr. TOWNSEND. When the President has determined how many, then must Congress authorize that number?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. The declaration of war does that, does it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It says—

And such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize.

Mr. HAY. Congress authorizes a call for volunteer forces, and then the President determines how many he will call out. The Congress then has nothing more to do with those forces, except to pay them and maintain them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I want to get this clear in my mind. It says—

And such volunteer forces as Congress may authorize.

Must Congress first authorize a certain number of volunteers?

Mr. HAY. No; Congress simply authorizes the President to call out the volunteer forces of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is not this the procedure: First, we declare war——

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And then we authorize the President to call out the volunteer forces, or we do both at the same time.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HAY. We may do both at the same time, and then the President determines how many volunteers he will call out, and then he will proceed to organize them under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman said that first there would be a declaration of war. This bill provides that in case of war or the imminence of war——

Mr. HAY. Yes; but then Congress must declare war.

Mr. MURDOCK. Before the authorization?

Mr. HAY. Yes. The Executive can not call for volunteers until Congress declares war, or authorizes the President to call them out.

Mr. STEENERSON. As I understand this bill, it does away with the Organized Militia to the extent that they come into this volunteer force.

Mr. HAY. It does away with the Organized Militia as such in time of war. That is, I mean if the Organized Militia wants to be a part of the force that is going to war it must volunteer.

Mr. STEENERSON. And it must cease to be an Organized Militia of the State.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The necessity for that is the opinion of the Attorney General rendered a couple of years ago that the Organized Militia law, act of March 21, 1908, the bill for which was reported by me as chairman of the Committee on Militia, providing that the militia might be called out and sent either within or without the United States—that that law was unconstitutional.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. And it is to obviate that constitutional objection that this bill is written, endeavoring to transfer the militia into a volunteer army.

Mr. HAY. That is one reason.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is not that the principal reason?

Mr. HAY. I can not say that that is the principal reason for this bill. We would have to have volunteers anyway, because the Organized Militia would not be sufficient.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the ruling of the Attorney General should turn out to be erroneous, that the Organized Militia law amendment to the Dick law referred to, if that law should be determined to be constitutional, so that it would be legal and constitutional for the President to send the Organized Militia outside the United States, then the necessity for this provision would not exist.

Mr. HAY. No; it would not.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want to say to the House that the only authority was the ruling of Attorney General Wickersham on that point, and when the Committee on Militia considered the Dick law and amendment that was requested by the War Department it contained this provision, that the militia might be used outside the United States. The Judge Advocate General of the United States Army made an elaborate argument and cited many authorities, to the effect that when the President calls forth the militia, pursuant to a declaration of war, it is in reality and effect to execute a law of the Union, and therefore within the Constitution.

The opinion of the Attorney General of February 17, 1912, to the Secretary of War was in answer to the following question:

> Whether or not under existing laws the President has authority to call forth the Organized Militia of the States and send it into a foreign country with the Regular Army as a part of an army of occupation, especially should the United States intervene in the affairs of such country under conditions short of actual warfare?

The question seems to have been unfortunately framed, for under the conditions specified it is at least open to grave question whether the President could legally send any army whatever into a foreign country. It seems to me that the sending of an army by the President into a foreign country "under conditions short of actual warfare" would, ordinarily, be an act of war and would be illegal unless previously authorized by law; that is, by declaration of war in due form enacted by Congress. Commenting on the clause of the Constitution, which says:

> The Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, and to repel invasions;

The opinion says:

> What is certainly meant by this provision is that Congress shall have power to call forth the militia in aid of the civil power, for the peaceful execution of the laws of the Union, wherever such laws are in force and may be compulsorily executed.

But Congress is nowhere authorized to call forth the militia. That power rests with the President. All that Congress can do is to provide by law for calling it forth. It is the President who, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia, does the calling and not Congress.

The whole opinion is based upon the theory that the laws of the United States have no extraterritorial force. Speaking of ordinary laws, that is true. But there are other laws of the United States that do have extraterritorial force and which do require to be executed. Congress has the power to "define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations." Manifestly laws enacted in pursuance of this authority operate extraterritorially. Congress also has power under the Constitution "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water." Obviously laws enacted pursuant to this authority also have an extraterritorial force and require to be executed. The same can be said of laws enacted pursuant to the authority "to raise and support armies, to provide for the maintenance of the Navy, and to make rules for the government and regulation of land and naval forces." There are three cases in which the militia may be called forth by the President: First, to execute the laws of the Union; second, to suppress insurrections; and third, repel invasions. The power to declare war is vested in Congress and is legislative in its character, and its exercise is an act of Congress and a law and is subject to the approval of the President. To repel invasions or suppress insurrections requires no declaration of war and hence no law. It is one of the duties of the Executive of the United States, incident to his office, to do both of these things without any further legislation; that is, suppress insurrections and repel invasions. But offensive war must be commenced by a declaration of war, and the power to declare war is in Congress, and therefore must be preceded by a law which requires execution.

At the time of the adoption of the Constitution the Regular Army consisted of 75 men; 50 were at West Point and 25 were at Pittsburgh, and the framers of the Constitution recognized full well that Congress was not under the slightest obligation to establish a standing army or to provide for any other military forces than the militia, with a view to national defense, and volunteer forces seem not to have been known to the framers of the Constitution, for it is a subject never mentioned either in that instrument or in the debates. The first appearance of volunteer forces seems to have been in 1812. The militia was used in the War of 1812, in the War with Mexico, and in the Civil War, and was sent beyond our borders whenever necessary, and when so sent they were sent to execute the laws of the Union, enacted pursuant to the Constitution.

The act of May 27, 1908, "To further amend the act entitled 'An act to promote the efficiency of the militia,'" etc., provides for the calling forth of the militia by the President, and that he may specify in his call the period of time for which such service may be required, and that the militia so called shall continue in the service during the term specified, either within or outside of the territory of the United States. The question of the constitutionality of this provision was carefully considered before its enactment, and I have seen no reason since to change my opinion as to its validity.

The construction adopted by the Attorney General wipes out of the Constitution the first cause for calling forth the militia entirely and makes the clause read as if it said "to suppress insurrection and repel invasions for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the Union," but as the sole object and purpose of suppressing insurrections and repelling invasions is to enforce all domestic laws, both of the States and the Union, such a limitation on the power to call forth the militia would be absurd.

Besides declarations of war there are, as we have seen, other laws of the Union, authorized by the Constitution, that operate extraterritorially, and require to be executed. These laws do not follow, but accompany our flag wherever our forces may be. Assuming, therefore, that circumstances could arise when it would be lawful in time of peace to send an army of occupation into a foreign country, it could only be to execute those other laws of the Union, and therefore the use of the Army and the militia for such an enterprise rests exactly upon the same footing, and there is as much authority for the one as the other.

Mr. HAY. I did not yield to the gentleman to make an argument.

Mr. STEENERSON. Of course, we are going to pass this bill because of the emergency that now exists. We will stand by the President and give him what he asks for the defense of the Nation and its honor. At the same time it will be well to bear in mind that this measure, so far as it relates to the militia, is revolutionary in character. It wipes out the militia and allows its men a preference in enlisting in the new volunteer force. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Under this bill not only have the States nothing to say about officering the transformed militia organizations, but only those men are accepted whom the United States accepts, the same as new recruits.

It is a repeal of the militia law, so far as service to the General Government is concerned.

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. SLOAN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHERLEY). To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, amendment No. 3 provides for the enlistment as volunteer forces of militia organizations under certain conditions, and in line 9, relative to the officers of such militia organizations, it is stated that they "may be appointed" by the President as officers of the volunteer organizations. How does the gentleman construe the word "may"? Is it in any sense mandatory?

Mr. HAY. I construe it to mean that the President may appoint him or not, as he sees fit.

Mr. MONDELL. And it is a direction on the part of Congress that they shall be appointed if qualified and worthy.

Mr. HAY. I take it so; yes.

Mr. MONDELL. If a militia company, regiment, or a battalion volunteers generally that will be due largely to the influence of their officers and with the expectation that if the officer is qualified he will be appointed. But this language is in no degree mandatory.

Mr. HAY. No; and I do not think it ought to be.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with the gentleman, but it would seem to carry with it the view of Congress that the officers should be appointed if qualified and fit for the service.

Mr. HAY. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, one question more. On page 4, section 4, there is a provision in the lines 8 and 9 as it passed the House which provides that no distinction shall be made between the Regular Army and the Organized Militia and the Volunteer forces while in the military service of the United States in respect to promotion, and so forth. Now, the conferees agree to strike out the word "promotion."

Mr. HAY. No; the Senate struck out the word "promotion" and in conference the Senate receded. The word "promotion" remains in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that with the language in the bill the two forces are to be considered one; that promotions would be made from the Volunteer forces to the Regular forces?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. MONDELL. But that in all respects promotions are to be made in the Volunteer forces on the same general rule and principles that they are made in the Regular Army.

Mr. HAY. Yes; in the Regular Army. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. The chairman said that the President may appoint four officers from the Regular Army as officers in each regiment.

Mr. HAY. Not more than four.

Mr. SLOAN. It may be that the four leading offices of a regiment from any one of the States may be officered by the appointment from the Regular Army by the President?

Mr. HAY. It might be, but I do not think that in any case it ever would be.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the chairman say that it is not contemplated that this shall be done?

Mr. HAY. I think I can say that the regular officers of a volunteer regiment will not all of them be given the highest rank of that regiment. Of course I do not know what the President or the War Department might do, but I am arguing from common sense, and I take it that these officers from the Regular Army would be put in the volunteer regiments for the purpose of training and teaching the volunteers the art of war and how to take care of themselves in war, and not for the purpose of imposing on the volunteer regiment regular officers and giving them the highest rank in the regiment.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the chairman, drawing his information from common sense and from conferences which he has had with the officers of this Government, say that he can give the country a reasonable assurance that probably the four leading officers of the regiments from the various States will not be made from the Regular Army, and that our men from the States, who have built up their State organizations, shall have the first call with a reasonable expectancy of occupying the four leading positions in the regiment?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I have had no conference with the officers of the Army or with the President or with the Secretary of War. I only know and believe that they are reasonable men and that they are not going to do a thing like that, which would immediately discredit any administration which pursued such a course, and I am satisfied it will not be pursued.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. As I understand the bill, militia organizations already in existence and volunteer organizations to be afterwards organized are practically on an equal footing when they tender their services to the Government.

Mr. HAY. They are.

Mr. TAGGART. The only difference between the militia officers now in the service commissioned by the State governors and those men who may apply for appointment as commissioned officers in other volunteer organizations is this: That the service of these militia officers will be taken into consideration by the appointing power.

Mr. HAY. I think so; yes.

Mr. TAGGART. That the President is not obliged under this bill to reappoint the same officers that any organization has now.

Mr. HAY. No; he is not.

Mr. TAGGART. But he may vary these appointments and may assign these Regular Army officers to any unit of any part of the regiment that may offer itself.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. In fact, that all volunteers offered to the Government are on an equal footing, so far as the letter of the law is concerned.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. And it is only recommendation and experience that will commend themselves under the law.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the question I desire to ask has been asked a good many times this afternoon. I want to know whether this does not take away the power of the governors of the States to name the officers of the regiment?

Mr. HAY. It does not take away the power, because the governor has not the power now.

Mr. MADDEN. He has the power to name up to the colonel, has he not?

Mr. HAY. No. He has the power to do that in the Organized Militia, but when the Organized Militia volunteers in the service of the United States, under this bill, it ceases to be Organized Militia.

Mr. TOWNSEND. "While in the service of the United States."

Mr. HAY. And therefore the President is given under this bill the right to make these appointments, because they are volunteer forces and not Organized Militia.

Mr. MADDEN. So that no governor of any State can commission any man who goes into the volunteer service, even though a whole militia regiment may volunteer?

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. TAGGART. And let me add this, that should at that time or now the governor of any State commission a soldier or officer in a militia regiment, that commission would remain until he tendered his services to the Government and they were accepted.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. And then it would operate merely as a recommendation and not as any claim on the Government for any preference.

Mr. HAY. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KIRKPATRICK].

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, to my mind we are about to take a new departure in this matter, and in my judgment it will complicate matters somewhat. Heretofore and at the present time it is the custom that officers of companies and regiments are elected by the men, and, when so elected, they are then commissioned by the governors of the respective States. It is now proposed in this measure to give that privilege to the President of the United States, together with the advice and consent of the governor, which would not be so very bad except for the fact that, after that is done, it then goes to the Senate of the United States for confirmation; and if these appointments are hung up in the Senate, as we have seen them in so many cases in past years, would not that complicate matters in an emergency such as now confronts us?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I can not conceive that the Senate of the United States would impede the progress of a war by holding up somebody's nomination.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. We can only judge the future by the past.

Mr. HAY. I have never known the Senate to do that in time of war. I have known them to do that for political reasons in time of peace.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. We have had an exhibition of dissent already in this House.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, there are three propositions in the bill. The first is to get around the constitutional objection to taking the Organized Militia as a unit. As I understand, that is one of the objects of the bill. Organized Militia companies are simply permitted to volunteer as a unit.

Mr. HAY. Yes; we take them as a unit.

Mr. WINGO. Where three-fourths of the enlisted men of the regiment volunteer they are accepted as a unit.

Mr. HAY. Three-fourths of the minimum enlisted strength.

Mr. WINGO. Yes. As to the proposition of commissioned officers, I understood the gentleman to say, in answer to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], that the appointment of officers below the grade of brigadier general—in other words, the regimental officers—was made mandatory upon the recommendation of the governor?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not state that.

Mr. WINGO. Under this bill, if it becomes a law, without expressing any opinion as to the alleged evil with reference to political colonels, then it would be impossible to appoint a political colonel unless the President approved?

Mr. HAY. That is true.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, one more check is added. At the present time the governor may, over his own judgment, appoint a man as colonel whom he recognizes from a military standpoint should not be appointed.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. But if he yields to the pressure now the President will always have jurisdiction before the political colonel will be appointed.

Mr. HAY. In other words, the President makes the appointment, and not the governor. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose you have members of the militia volunteering under this system who would like to hold together under their own officers and who must take their chances, since the distribution of officers as well as of men is to take place at the discretion of the President after they have been mustered in. What becomes of those officers of a higher grade than colonel?

Mr. HAY. They will be appointed by the President if they are worthy of appointment, and therefore there has been no provision made in this bill for the appointment of general officers, for the reason that during the Spanish War the bill in that case provided for the appointment of general officers without any limitation upon the number, and the result was that a large number of general officers were appointed who did not have even a command, but went around with a staff. Now, what is proposed to be done is, when war is declared, if it is declared, that we will then know how many volunteers the President will call out, and then we will authorize the number of generals that he may appoint, so there will not be a lot of generals appointed without any soldiers to command.

Mr. MOORE. I have in mind the highest officer in the militia in my State, who is a major general and the commander of brigades, whom, I suppose, rank as brigadier generals. They would not come in under this system at all and would have to be recognized by the President in some other way, according to their experience and worth?

Mr. HAY. Yes; I have no doubt that Pennsylvania, with her brigade or division, that the President would appoint a brigadier general from that State who had experience with those troops.

Mr. MOORE. The bill does not provide for that, but it is left to the discretion of the President?

Mr. HAY. Undoubtedly; and I think the President should have this discretion.

Mr. MOORE. One other question, if the gentleman pleases. An organized body of men, trained in soldiery, and not attached to the Organized Militia of the State, is in my mind now.

Mr. HAY. City troops.

Mr. MOORE. Well, the city troops are attached to the State militia. They are organizations of high grade and historic interest; but I have in mind a body called the State Fencibles, and other bodies not attached to the regular militia of the State. How would they be treated in the event of the passage of this bill, not being of the Organized Militia?

Mr. HAY. The Organized Militia of Pennsylvania would first be called into service as volunteers. If they did not make up the quota of the State, then these other troops the gentleman is speaking about could volunteer, and doubtless would be accepted and would be upon the same footing.

Mr. MOORE. Now, we understand and these men may understand that after offering their services if there is not a sufficient number of regiments to make up the quota of the State in response to the President's call, they may come into the service if the President accepts them?

Mr. HAY. Yes. Now I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BARTON. At that point, suppose there were 250,000 volunteers called for and there were 118,000 militia. Now, in constituting its quota does the gentleman take into consideration the number of regiments that there are by the number of militia there are in each State?

Mr. HAY. No; each State is given its quota in accordance with its population.

Mr. BARTON. The point I want to ask is, in Nebraska—and I had a wire this morning that there were three regiments ready for service—suppose Nebraska's quota would not take up those three regiments?

Mr. HAY. Then Nebraska would have to furnish other volunteers to make up the quota.

Mr. BARTON. The gentleman does not understand me. Suppose they had more in the three regiments than their quota, would they have preference over volunteers in another State that did not have a sufficient militia quota?

Mr. HAY. They would not.

Mr. BARTON. That is the point I wanted to get clear in my mind.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman this question for my personal information. In speaking of the preference to be given to militia organizations in the various States the gentleman and those who have interrogated him have referred to regiments. Do I understand no less organization than a regiment will be given preference?

Mr. HAY. The law provides that any troop, battery, company, battalion, or regiment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand that the bill as it passed the House provided for the acceptance of the militia as individuals and not by companies. Now, I understand the Senate provision would incorporate them either by company, regiment, and brigade if three-fourths——

Mr. HAY. No brigade.

Mr. STAFFORD. By regiment if three-fourths are in favor of enlistment. I assume that the individuals constituting those three-fourths will, nevertheless, enlist as individuals and the minority of one-fourth will not be brought into the service, even though three-fourths should register their approval to enlist.

Mr. HAY. It is entirely voluntary on the part of the members of the organization of the militia; they do not have to do it if they do not want to.

Mr. HULINGS. I would like to ask what seems to me is a fundamental question, and we all ought to have it settled in our minds. The Constitution of the United States provides that all able-bodied men between the ages of 18 and 45 shall constitute the militia; that the President shall be commander in chief of the militia when called into service; but that the right to appoint officers shall be reserved to the governors of the States.

Mr. HAY. That is the Organized Militia.

Mr. HULINGS. That is the militia. At the time of the Constitution they did not know anything about the Organized Militia. They stick to the word "militia."

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will read the Constitution he will find the words "organized militia."

Mr. HULINGS. I have read the Constitution as often as you have.

Mr. HAY. I have not time to go into the constitutional question, but if the gentleman wants to ask me any question about——

Mr. HULINGS. I have asked you a question which I think is a fair one.

Mr. HAY. What is the question?

Mr. HULINGS. I have recited the Constitution to you, and I know what it says. I ask you how you get around that question?

Mr. HAY. I have stated to the gentleman that the Constitution says "Organized Militia" and not "militia."

Mr. HULINGS. The Constitution says the militia shall comprise able-bodied men between the ages of 18 and 45, and does not speak of "Organized Militia."

Mr. HAY. It says:

> Congress shall have the power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline described by Congress.

Now, if there is no other question——

Mr. WILLIS. I want to be sure I understand the answer that you gave to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. Now, suppose that there are two organizations here. In a case where there are more volunteers from a State than that State is entitled to under its quota—here are a thousand men connected with the State militia, over here a thousand men in an independent organization—what I want to know is, does this State organization have any preference in being received in the service over the independent organization?

Mr. HAY. It has under the reading of this bill; yes.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, where is the language under which it has that preference? The amendment proposed by the conferees is as follows:

Provided further, That when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of any company, troop, or battery, or when three-fourths of the prescribed minimum enlisted strength of each company, troop, or battery comprised in any battalion or regiment of the organized land militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, organized as prescribed by law and War Department regulations, shall volunteer and be accepted for service in the Volunteer Army as such company, troop, battery, battalion, or regiment, such organization may be received into the volunteer forces in advance of other organizations of the same arm or class from the same State, Territory, or District, and the officers in the organized land militia service with such organization may then, within the limits prescribed by law, be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as officers of corresponding grades in the Volunteer Army and be assigned to the same grades in the said organizations or elsewhere as the President may direct.

Now, is that language the only language that bears on the point?

Mr. HAY. You will find there, after the words in line 1 of the bill, it says:

Any battalion or regiment of the Organized Land Militia of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia organized as prescribed by law or War Department regulations.

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will permit further, does it say that this State organization will have the preference? What I am getting at is that language where the word "may" is used. It says "it may be received" into the volunteer forces in advance of other organizations. Does that leave it entirely optional with the President?

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. WILLIS. Then it is like the provision as to the appointment of officers. It is merely directory and not mandatory?

Mr. HAY. That is right. Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is no other question, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHERLEY). The gentleman from Virginia demands the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

NAVAL STATION, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. This morning I introduced a resolution to make available certain unexpended balances heretofore appropriated for various purposes at the naval station at New Orleans for the operation of the shops there during the exigency of the present situation. The resolution has not been reported. It is at the Speaker's desk with the Clerk, and I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs may be discharged from further consideration thereof, and that the resolution be considered now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the following resolution, and that the same be now considered. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 253.

Resolved, etc., That any unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the naval station, New Orleans, La., and not yet turned back into the Treasury, are hereby reappropriated and made available for expenditure at that station for such purposes as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman either have read or inserted in the RECORD the letter of the Secretary?

Mr. PADGETT. I was going to ask for the reading of the letter.

Mr. MANN. How much is the available balance?

Mr. PADGETT. The unobligated balance is $233,097.05, as shown by the detailed statement in the letter of the Secretary.

Mr. MANN. And the reason for this is to maintain the naval station at New Orleans because it is convenient to naval vessels now at Vera Cruz and Tampico?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir. It does not contemplate the erection of any buildings or permanent improvements, but the Secretary said he might have to buy some few tools, but very few of those, for the operation and maintenance of the yard incident to the conditions existing in the Gulf.

Mr. MANN. What other navy yard is there now to which those vessels could go?

Mr. PADGETT. There is a small yard at Key West, Fla.

Mr. MANN. And they have nothing else on the Gulf?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. There is Pensacola, up on the Gulf, but that is not in condition to operate at this time.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is the unexpended balance of the amount appropriated for that navy yard for 1914?

Mr. PADGETT. No. Money has been appropriated at various times heretofore, and there have been unexpended balances of appropriations made for that yard, and they have not been covered back into the Treasury.

Mr. BARTLETT. They have not?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why have they not been?

Mr. PADGETT. Because they were for such purposes that they did not have to be covered back. They were for such purposes that they were available until used.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What is the aggregate amount?

Mr. PADGETT. Two hundred and thirty-three thousand and ninety-seven dollars and five cents.

Mr. MANN. Those amounts are all set forth in the letter of the Secretary?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; in detail.

Mr. BARTLETT. Are the purposes for which the money is to be used specified in the Secretary's letter also? I do not ask that the gentleman read it.

Mr. PADGETT. Not in detail. He states here:

The department strongly urges that the total amount not being now needed for specific appropriations be reappropriated for expenditure at the naval station, New Orleans, for such purposes as the Secretary of the Navy may direct. This in view of the existing emergency and the necessity for providing to the extent of the capacity of the New Orleans station for the numerous vessels operating in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the resolution which the gentleman offers, but which I did not hear read, authorize the Secretary of the Navy to divert this fund from the purposes for which it was appropriated?

Mr. PADGETT. From the purposes for which it was originally appropriated.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; that is what I mean.

Mr. PADGETT. For such purposes at this station as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, for how many years do these unexpended balances accumulate?

Mr. PADGETT. Some of them were from the act of 1904, some from the act of 1905, some from the act of 1906, some from the act of 1907, and some from the acts of 1908, 1909, and 1910.

Mr. MURDOCK. And how much is the total?

Mr. PADGETT. The total is $233,097.05.

Mr. MURDOCK. And does the statement show the nature of the accumulated items, year by year?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the nature of the acts under which they were appropriated?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; the amounts remaining under each act.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. May I ask the gentleman if the yard is used at all?

Mr. PADGETT. It is to be used for these purposes. This money was appropriated for the New Orleans yard for certain specific purposes, and the Secretary wants to enlarge the purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Is it not a fact that the Pensacola yard is nearer the base of operations than New Orleans is?

Mr. PADGETT. It would depend on where the operations were.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Say, at Vera Cruz.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not believe it would be.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] this question: If this exigency had not arisen down there at this time, what would have become of these unexpended balances?

Mr. PADGETT. Later on, I presume, they would have been turned in.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is there any time limit on that sort of thing?

Mr. PADGETT. The funds are available until used, and every now and then the Secretary gathers up these unexpended balances and turns them back into the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the House joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert this letter from the Secretary of the Navy as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 23, 1914.

Hon. LEMUEL P. PADGETT,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. PADGETT: Under various Congresses certain sums have been appropriated for projects at the navy yard, New Orleans, La. From these appropriations there are now remaining unexpended balances. This is due either to the work having cost less than originally estimated, or not being considered necessary in the present status of the yard.

The amounts involved are as follows:

	Amount appropriated.	Unobligated balance.
Act Apr. 27, 1904:
Shops for Steam Engineering and fittings and gradings (previous appropriation $100,000)	$35,000.00	$308.07
Coal bins	5,000.00	1,011.16
Floor, Construction and Repair shops	5,500.00	797.77
Fencing naval property	10,000.00	7,680.42
Act Mar. 3, 1905:
Water system, extensions	5,000.00	465.57
Fire-protection system	10,000.00	1,327.68
Act June 29, 1906:
Machinery and tools for Yards and Docks shop	3,000.00	7,235.92
Sawmill, boat shop, and storage for Construction and Repair	60,000.00	57,147.61
Act Mar. 2, 1907:
Central electric light and power plant, extension (previous appropriations, $162,500)	50,000.00	59,718.87
Railroad system (previous appropriations, $30,000)	5,000.00	630.50
Fitting up yard buildings 8 and 16	4,300.00	1,800.90
Act May 13, 1908:
Drainage system, to continue	5,000.00	1,303.44
Central heating plant, extension	10,000.00	8,995.81
Underground conduit system	5,000.00	343.61
Improvements to machine shop, building No. 4	6,000.00	3,522.77
Sewer system, extension	5,000.00	3,744.74
Improvement to river front	25,000.00	1,823.92
Act Mar. 3, 1909, levee improvements and grading	45,000.00	10,560.58
Act June 24, 1910, power house and plant	64,677.71	64,677.71
Total unexpended balance		233,097.05

The department strongly urges that the total amount not being now needed for specific appropriations be reappropriated for expenditure at the naval station, New Orleans, for such purposes as the Secretary of the Navy may direct. This in view of the existing emergency and the necessity for providing to the extent of the capacity of the New Orleans station for the numerous vessels operating in the Gulf of Mexico.

The department requests that a resolution may be passed as soon as possible, as follows:

"That the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the naval station, New Orleans, La., and not yet turned back into the Treasury, are hereby reappropriated and made available for expenditure at that station for such purposes as the Secretary of the Navy may direct."

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up bill H. R. 15692, granting pensions and increases of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] calls up the bill H. R. 15692, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15692) granting pensions and increases of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I know of no desire on the part of anybody to engage in general debate, and I ask that the Clerk be directed to read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Colvin S. Roberts, late repairer of telegraph lines, Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I notice that there is a typographical error in stating the name of this pensioner. It should be "Calvin" instead of "Colvin S. Roberts."

Mr. RUSSELL. The gentleman knows that to be a fact?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. It should be "Calvin." I move, Mr. Speaker, an amendment to correct it. I move to amend by striking out the word "Colvin," on page 24, line 23, and inserting "Calvin."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 24, line 23, by striking out the word "Colvin" and substituting in lieu thereof the word "Calvin."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

The bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WHITE). The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 15959) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill by title.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to the Committee on Pensions:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there are two short Senate pension bills. Would it not be well to take them up now?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (S. 4167) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of other wars than the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHERLEY). The gentleman from Ohio calls up a bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill at length.

The following committee amendments were read, considered, and agreed to:

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, H. R. 14034.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] to use some of his time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much time has the gentleman remaining.

Mr. HENSLEY. I have 2 hours and 23 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to use most of that time now? I will say to him that on this side we have but 40 minutes, and it is my purpose to favor as much as I can the chairman of the committee. We will not have very much more general debate on our side.

Mr. HENSLEY. It is our purpose to use something like an hour now. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, the progress of this debate has removed one stumbling block in the way of a moderate Navy, and has dispelled one delusion of long standing, namely, that the German Navy is superior to the Navy of the United States. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] by a masterly array of irrefutable facts, has demonstrated that the German Navy is not superior to the Navy of the United States. He has clearly shown, therefore, that it is not a menace to the interests of this country, or to the security of our people. Hence there is no reason why the naval-construction program of the German Empire, should be matched, or paralleled, by the construction program of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I understand perfectly well that the events of the last week, are regarded as having in some measure given a jolt to the arguments of the friends of a moderate Navy. I understand further, that these events have created an atmosphere which renders it perfectly useless at this time, so far as any hope of present success is concerned, for the friends of peace, and the friends of moderation in the naval and military program, to press their views upon this House. I have no illusions on that subject. I know perfectly well that the spirit of the war god is marching on, in this country, and that in deference to his requirements, this House will bow the knee, and do his bidding. I know that much wise and constructive legislation will inevitably be lost in the haste to subordinate everything else, to legislation related to the military situation, that much unwise legislation will be enacted, and that at this time our efforts for moderation in armaments will be perfectly futile. I have no illusions on that subject, but I will not on that account fail to urge my views upon this body, or recede from the attitude which I have steadfastly maintained for many years past.

I know further that as a result of the atmosphere in which we will work, Congress will do many unwise things, will enact much injudicious legislation, and impose many burdens that in the future will require much painful effort on the part of the people of the United States, much toil, and many privations, to correct, and remove. I would be blind to the teachings of history, I would lose sight of the march of events under other circumstances analogous to those which now confront us, if I did not realize that all of these things will come to pass. And yet, Mr. Chairman, there never was a time when the wisdom of our views was more fully vindicated, when the logic of the argument was more decidedly in our favor, when the friends of a moderate Army and a moderate Navy, had more reason to felicitate themselves upon their attitude, than at this very moment. We have favored, and maintained a moderate Army, and that Army is to-day sufficient for our needs. We have opposed an extravagant Navy, and resisted the hysteria that has been clamorously demanding four battleships. We voted for one battleship last year. Who among the frothing jingoes is found to say that our present Army, and our present Navy, are not adequate to deal with either the present, or the prospective situation in Mexico? The arguments of the friends of a moderate Navy have not been overthrown. They have been sustained. There is not a feature of the situation now confronting us, there is not a possible outcome of the war that it is possible we may hereafter wage against the feeble, war-torn, distracted nation, that now faces us, that was not in contemplation as a possibility, by the men who have stood heretofore, and who stand now, for a moderate Army, and a moderate Navy.

On the other hand, the tragic events of the last week, have completely overthrown the arguments to which I have listened in this House, during the past eight years, to the effect that a great Army and a great Navy, would act as a preservative of peace, would keep us at amity with the world. The advocates of a big Navy have insisted that they did not favor such a Navy with an eye to war, but with an eye to peace, and the preservation of peace. They have insisted that a mighty program of naval construction was a peace movement, and a peace program.

Ah, how completely that argument has been overturned. There is no question of comparison between our armed forces, and those of our possible antagonist. Should we unfortunately become involved in war, it will be a war in which there will be neither glory, fame, profit, or advantage. What then has become of the argument that a great Navy would bring us peace, not war. In other words, our present Navy, great and mighty as it is, will neither keep the dominant nation from war, nor hinder the people of the weaker nation from taking up the challenge of war, should that challenge be thrust upon them. Whose arguments then have failed, the arguments of the friends of a moderate Navy, or the arguments of the men who have clamorously insisted upon a greater Navy in the name of peace?

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is not the gentleman proud of the fact that we now have an adequate Navy in the Gulf?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am proud of the fact that the present Navy which is far short of the demands of the so-called Navy experts, has proved to be far in excess of the exigencies of the present situation. Fortunately, so far, we have not conformed our building program, to the views and wishes of the naval board, or the naval experts.

In response to the query of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], whose question implies that we need all of this naval force in our controversy with Mexico, I will say that two gunboats in the Mexican waters, would be amply able to deal with the Mexican fleet, and meet every possibility in the way of danger from that fleet. No one pretends that the great monsters now steaming south, are required to meet any naval peril in that quarter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we would construct our Navy along the lines desired by the moderate-navy Members of this House, we would have less than 2 battleships at the present time instead of 25.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman with his extravagant ideas of naval expansion, is in a position to speak with authority as to the attitude of the friends of a moderate navy. I prefer to stand by our own speeches defining our attitude, and by our repeated declarations upon this floor, to the effect that the construction of one battleship a year, will provide us with a navy that will be adequate to every exigency that we may be called upon to meet. [Applause.] I have stood for that program in the past, I stand for it to-day, and I maintain that the course of events in Mexico, is a vindication of that attitude. Our present Navy is adequate in size, and is in the highest degree, an efficient fighting instrument.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did the gentleman vote for one battleship or two?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I voted for one battleship. What would be the naval program to-day if the so-called experts had been followed? Four battleships a year. What did they tell us that four battleships a year, or for that matter two battleships a year, would produce? Peace, not war—peace. Mr. Chairman, we will never be engaged in any future war, in which the disparity of naval forces will be greater, than in the one which confronts to-day. If a great naval program will bring peace, why are we not at peace with Mexico? If our present powerful fleet has not operated to maintain peace between this country and Mexico, does anyone believe that if we had been building four battleships a year for the past 20 years our relations to-day with that country would be on a more peaceful footing? You gentlemen might as well abandon your contention that a great armament means peace, and will bring peace. Frankly admit that you are building up a mighty Navy, with a view to war, and that you are thereby promoting militancy, and developing the war fever, and the war spirit.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Is it not a fact that the only argument adduced on the floor of this House in the last six years for a large naval armament has been that a large naval armament meant peace?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Absolutely.

Mr. CLINE. That is the only argument that has been advanced for a large armament?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, and so I insist that the logic of the present situation clearly shows that the argument for peace must be put upon some other ground, than upon numerous battleships, and a mighty Army.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did we not recently pass a peace resolution?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, but we are not so much concerned at present with the resolution which we passed, as with the fact that the battleships which we have constructed have not brought us peace. Let us keep our eyes on the main argument, and note the failure of your contention, in the light of subsequent events.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Has not the argument for a reasonably large line of battleships been that it would insure peace as against war waged against us, and not in contemplation of our engaging in an offensive war, which seems to be in progress to-day?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. The argument was that this country did not propose to wage an offensive war, and that a great Navy was needed for the security of our people, for the maintenance of our institutions, and for the preservation of peace between the nations.

The logic of events has overthrown the contention of the militants. A great Navy has not secured peaceful relations between us and a feeble nation, but has brought us to the verge of war. If we favor peace, universal peace, it is evident that it must be secured by some other means, and by some other way, than by the battleship route. Peace must be attained by peaceful methods, by the peaceful attitude, by moderation, by conciliation, by an indisposition to stand on punctilios which are an inheritance of a barbarous and savage age. You will never advance the cause of peace by extravagant construction of the machines that breed the tendency, and the disposition for strife.

The military caste, and the naval caste, the world over, are the same. Military ethics, the military code, the military punctilios, are the same everywhere. When a nation trains men for fighting purposes, it ought to control and direct them. It should not allow the military caste to control and direct public thought and public policy, or to determine the relations of this country with the peoples of the world.

It seems impossible for the men who talk big armaments, to keep the facts of the record straight. I have witnessed two illustrations of that within the last two days. On yesterday I heard the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] assert that the gentleman from Mississippi had stated that the Oregon could meet, overthrow, and destroy six German dreadnaughts. In my own mind I was assured that the gentleman from Mississippi had made no such statement, though I am not concerned to make any defense for the gentleman from Mississippi. He can speak for himself. I am concerned, however, as one of the men who are presenting the same sane, deliberate, conservative, and patriotic proposition for a moderate navy, that we have heretofore presented, in correcting an unfounded statement. It was not the claim of the gentleman from Mississippi, it is not our claim, that the Oregon, which is an old-fashioned battleship, could overthrow and destroy six German dreadnaughts. Such a claim would be ridiculous, and has never been made on our part on the floor of this House.

I recollect very well what was said, and the gentleman from Alabama should have met, and overthrown, if he could, the facts put into the RECORD by the gentleman from Mississippi, when he compared the fighting strength of an out-of-date American ship, with out-of-date German ships. He should not seek to advance his cause, by setting up a man of straw, in order to triumphantly overthrow him. The gentleman from Mississippi put into the RECORD facts that it behooves the gentlemen who hold the opposing view, to deal with, and to meet squarely and fairly. What did the gentleman from Mississippi say in this connection? He contrasted the armament of the Oregon, with the armament of the German battleships of the same age and type. That was a perfectly fair argument, and a fair comparison.

Having referred to the superiority of the guns and armor of the Oregon, over the guns and armor of the German battleships that he selected for the purpose of comparison, he proceeded to state that the Oregon was superior to any six German battleships of the era of the Oregon. He did not compare the Oregon with the German dreadnaughts, for the reason that he had exhausted the resources of argument to show the superiority of the dreadnaught, and of the superdreadnaught of to-day, over the battleships of any era, or of any generation.

The gentleman from Alabama consumed much of his time in seeking to show the vast inferiority of the Oregon, to our later types of fighting ships. This proposition has never been challenged, never denied, never controverted by any advocate of a moderate, modern, and efficient navy. I desire to say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that the assumption on the part of some of the protagonists of a greater navy, that their attitude is the attitude of patriotism, while the attitude of the friends of a moderate navy is due either to a crass ignorance of the vital problems of national defense, or to a pusillanimous preference for peace even at the expense of national honor, or the impairment of our territorial integrity, is not justified by any speech that has ever been made on our part on the floor of this House. I think that I am justified in saying that the advocates of a moderate navy are a body of sane, thoughtful, experienced, capable men, who are just as patriotic as the men who believe that our national honor, our national integrity, our national glory, require for their preservation a naval program of four battleships a year. [Applause.] And yet, as I said a moment ago, I am not blind to what is going on around me. The present state of the public mind, the atmosphere in which we are working, render possible the enactment of legislation which would be whistled down the wind under other conditions, and other circumstances.

I realize fully that when confronted with a possibility of war, all sense of proportion is lost. Men lose their reason, and "judgment flies to brutish beasts." But if I have heretofore maintained with a full sense of patriotic duty any attitude toward a great public question like our naval policy, that attitude should not be abandoned, merely because I realize that under present conditions the forces of opposition will be successful. I am ready like every other patriotic man to vote the supplies that the urgency of the situation will require, but this naval program is for the future, not the present. The ships voted for in the present bill, will never take part in the present war, and there is nothing in the facts of the past 48 hours, to justify a departure from the construction program of a year ago. It is hateful to me to hear this possibility of war with a prostrate and feeble nation, made the occasion for a glorification of our fighting strength. The disparity between the contending parties is too great. There might be honor and glory in a war with some great power, a power that would cause this country to extend itself, but a war with feeble Mexico, will be too unequal. It will be a repetition on a greater scale of the war with the Filipinos. [Applause.] There is little occasion to applaud ourselves over our wars with inferior nations. They have been but little to our credit. We are a brave people, a vigorous people, a militant, dominant, overmastering, overpowering people. All these things may be truly said of us, so that I am proud to proclaim: Civis Americanus sum. But we have not been particularly gentle, or magnanimous in our dealings with inferior races.

Mr. SHARP. Will the gentleman yield for a question at that point?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. SHARP. Is not what the gentleman has stated right now one of the best reasons for believing that in the interest of national peace this country of ours, above all others, can afford not to carry on this endless work of increasing our battleships?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have been developing that contention for the last eight years, and I trust that I have not been unmindful during all that time, of the honor, the reputation, the prosperity and the welfare of the American people, and the glory of the American flag. [Applause.] I wish to say in this connection, and I know that I speak for all of my colleagues in this matter, that to keep our flag in the forefront, as it now is, of civilization and progress, and to maintain everywhere our real honor and our real glory, there is no sacrifice that we would not be willing to make. [Applause.] But at a time like this we lose sight of the real relation of things. The sense of proportion is gone. Under the influence of the spirit now abroad, we love to applaud ourselves not only for the qualities that we possess, but for other qualities to which we have no claim, and to impute to ourselves motives, and conduct, and ideals, that are utterly at variance with the teachings of history. On yesterday I listened to the gentleman from Alabama as he sounded our praises. We love to be patted on the back, to be stroked as a cat is stroked, to have imputed to us, generosities that we have not displayed, and excellencies that we have not exhibited.

The gentleman from Alabama with the fervor of war upon him, proceeded to tell of the wars that we have waged, of the ideal conditions under which those wars have been prosecuted, of the generosity, magnanimity, self-sacrifices, and self-abnegation that we have showed, in comparison with what other nations have exhibited, when waging wars and making conquests. I do not know any country in the world, having in mind the wars that we have waged with weaker peoples, that has grabbed a larger portion of fat lands, as a result of war, than the United States. By war we pushed back the Indian aborigines, until now we own this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I do not stop to deny that in the ultimate this, in a large way, will be for the benefit of mankind, but we are not entitled to any credit for generosity, or magnanimity, in this connection. Whatever the motives, or the excuses, our acquisitions have been made by the stark use of the mailed fist. We have taken whatever was in sight. We went to war with Mexico over 50 years ago. History tells us that the causes for that war were trivial, yet as a result of it, we took a large slice of rich territory, and still further made broad our phylacteries, and extended the limits of the United States.

We did not fare so badly in a territorial way, as a result of the war with Spain. We came out of that war with Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands to our credit, and if we did not take Cuba, it was because, having reference to the declarations that had been made on our part, we could not have taken that island, and kept our face before the world. Since that time we have been near unto taking it on a very trivial pretext. At the conclusion of the Spanish War, we insisted upon the Philippines. We were so anxious to secure these islands that we were willing to take them with a lien, in the shape of a native war. It was always thought until the official dispatches were published, that we took the Philippines to save the face of Spain, but later it was ascertained that the commissioners who were sent by the United States to negotiate the treaty of peace, were charged by the President of the United States to insist upon the Philippines as an irreducible minimum. Spain, however, has been amply revenged upon us in that connection. If she wished us ill as a result of that cession of territory, she has certainly seen that wish fulfilled. But the fact that we have been disappointed in our acquisition, the fact that the Philippines have not turned out to be the desirable possession that we fondly hoped that they would be, none the less changes the fact that as a part of the proceeds of that war, we insisted upon territorial additions, and secured what was deemed to be, at the time, a rich and desirable enlargement of our landed domains. We became landlords over the seas.

Now that the war spirit is abroad, now that this atmosphere of war has been created, the man who descants upon the glories and generosity of the United States in antecedent wars, touches a popular chord. I know that full well. I know, however, another thing, and that is that if the United States desires to cultivate the peace spirit, if it wants peace, peace with honor, peace with security, peace with the maintenance of national dignity, peace coextensive with the world, we must seek it by some other route than by an excessive expansion of either the naval, or the military arm. [Applause.] We must pursue a different course; we must lay a different foundation; we must adopt a different attitude; we must reach out, and create a different environment, if we desire peace among the nations, and the devolpment of the peaceful spirit at home.

Another distressing feature of a time like this, is the extravagant laudation of everybody, and everything connected with war. I do not know why this should be true, but it is true, and it has always been true. Men can be induced to enact the most extravagant and unwise legislation, by laudatory references to acts done by an army, or a naval officer in the ordinary performance of duty. Why should he not do his duty? Why should he not fight? He does fight. The history of the American Navy is the history of fighting. Why not? We train our naval officers for that sole and exclusive purpose. We set them apart for that function. We create them for that, and for no other purpose. Why should they not do their duty, after we have educated them, given them opportunity, and relieved them from all anxieties and responsibility in connection with the mere details of livelihood. Why should they not do their duty, and do it manfully, when the time arrives for them to make some return to their country, for all that their country has done for them? I rejoice in the fact that the history of the Navy is the history of duty well done. For one, I will not allow myself to be put into a false position, or advance any statements that can furnish the ground for the unjust charge hereafter that I am attacking in a captious, or sneering way, either the military, or naval arm of the Government. The moderate-navy, and the moderate-army advocates, repudiate the imputation that we are indisposed to do justice either to the Army, or to the Navy personnel.

But it is an unfortunate thing that the discharge of duty by one arm of our Government, should be the subject of such extravagant and overweening laudation, that it destroys our sense of proportion, and lessens our capacity and our disposition to do justice to other equally meritorious and deserving public servants, and renders impossible the legislation that would build up the welfare, and promote the uplift of all the people of the United States. I say that this is an unfortunate thing. And yet we have many manifestations of this attitude.

On yesterday I heard the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] speak to a sympathetic audience when he referred to the "poor naval officers," doing their duty, without adequate public appreciation of their service, or of their value. I do not know any portion of the American people to which the phrase "poor" can be applied with less propriety, than to the men who serve in the Navy in the capacity of officers. Their ways are made easy for them. In many instances the Members of Congress have opened the doors of opportunity by their appointments to the Naval Academy. These fortunate appointees have in many instances chances for an education, and for a career, such as otherwise they would never have enjoyed. Their surroundings as cadets are of a most enviable character. They begin life with an adequate salary. They have no fear for the future. As they advance in rank, their salaries are raised. When the time comes to retire, they are liberally pensioned. Why speak of their unhappy lot, and in that connection use the word that was used on yesterday,—"poor"? Why say that the American people have been ungrateful to them? What particular occasion was there for remarks of this character in connection with the pending bill? We create at Annapolis a body of men for certain specific purposes. They would be ingrates if they did not do their duty along that line for which they have been specially educated, and specially prepared.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. HENSLEY. Is it not a fact that within the last 15 years we have increased the appropriations for this department 400 per cent?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, on the money side, on the side of loaves and fishes, from every point of view, if you go into that inquiry, there is no portion of our public servants who are better provided for than the Army and Navy officers. As I said, we set them up, we give them an outlook on life, we give them opportunity, we pay them liberal salaries, we provide them with a comfortable environment. We have a right to expect good service. I remember an admiral who came from the little mountain town of Floyd in my district—"Fighting Bob" Evans. Probably if he had not received the appointment to the Naval Academy, he might in time have attained the high position of postmaster at Floyd. There are many mute, inglorious Miltons. Admiral Evans did his duty, and did it well. Why not? His country made him, trained him to do certain things, and had the right to expect an ample return of duty well done. Was he discharging any more sacred and solemn obligation of duty than the Members of this House, in their relations to the public welfare? Was he discharging any more solemn obligation of duty than many a fireman who goes to death under circumstances which exhibit a heroism as great as the Charge of the Light Brigade? Yet the fireman dies unwept, unhonored, and unsung. The ordinary policeman on our streets, taking the service year in and year out, incurs greater risks than the average soldier in the Army of the United States, and does his duty just as well. But we do not become enthused over him, we do not lose our sense of proportion, we do not create in his case an atmosphere that causes us to subordinate all other interests, and cripple other acts of needed legislation, in taking care of the policeman, or the fireman, or other men doing their duty under heroic circumstances.

Can the advocates of a greater navy distort these comments into a criticism of the Army, or the Navy? They must go far afield if they can find in them any carping criticism upon the one, or the other. I am simply trying to put before you things as they actually are, to strip away the surrounding glamor, which is a part of the accursed war spirit. It is the atmosphere of war which causes us to see things out of proportion, and to fail in our duty to other classes of society, and to other interests, which are fully as deserving of our fostering care, our admiration, our attention, and our appropriations, as either the Army, or the Navy.

I wish to say another thing in this connection, and that is that because you train a man to fight, and equip him to fight, and because he does fight—and we rejoice in the fact that when occasion arises our fighting men do their full duty—it does not follow that the disposition of the problems of national statesmanship should be committed to that man. This is the body that ought to fix and control the policies of the Nation. The man who drives an engine, may be efficient in that capacity, but we do not call him in as an expert to determine the question of the Government ownership of railroads. A mercantile firm may leave the care of its motor cars to its chauffeur, and may advise with him as to the best type of car. But the firm determines its policy with respect to the use of motor cars, how far it will go, in that direction, and how many cars it will purchase. The policy with respect to the use of motor cars is fixed by the firm, while the duty of the chauffeur is to do the work that he is retained to do. He is not called upon to determine the question of policy.

The advocates of a moderate Army and of a moderate Navy, insist that this body should fix our naval policy. They maintain that the solution of these problems ought to be relegated to the civilian statesmanship of the country. The problems that relate to the national welfare, the problems that relate to the national growth, the problems that relate to our future, to our security, and to our interests, are all committed to the care of the civilian statesmanship of this country, and we are false to our constituencies, and to our duty, when we allow the military, or the naval arm of the Government, to usurp a function that belongs to us, and to speak with authority in the establishment of our military policy.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] showed on yesterday that he was a technical expert. I grant it. The gentleman from Alabama has been a fighting man, with a glorious record. We all admit that. But the gentleman from Alabama, neither by training, nor environment, has, as the result of that military education, any superiority or advantage over any other Member of this House, in determining what the naval policy of this country ought to be. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. What is the necessity, then, of our Navy General Board?

Mr. SAUNDERS. None. It ought to have been abolished long ago. [Applause.] Our Navy General Board was created for the express purpose of forcing us into still greater extravagances of naval construction than even the Naval Committee, or the House are willing to stand for.

I will answer further the question which the gentleman from Illinois propounded. If the naval board is entitled to speak with authority, why is it that the Naval Committee has not followed its recommendations?

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me again?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No; I do not wish to yield. I know the gentleman from Illinois will not regard me as being discourteous, if I decline to yield further at this time.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, if the gentleman will excuse me. I wish to answer the question which the gentleman from Illinois propounded. If the naval board is entitled to speak with authority, why is it that you gentlemen of the Naval Committee will not follow its recommendations?

Mr. BRITTEN. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I say, if the naval board is entitled to speak with authority, why do not you gentlemen of the Committee on Naval Affairs follow its recommendations?

Mr. BRITTEN. We try to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. You do not. They recommend four battleships.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is because Members like the gentleman will not let us.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, you are supreme in the Naval Committee.

Mr. SISSON. What authority is there in law, and what law did Congress pass for the creation of this board?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know; but I am attempting to discuss the point suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, and assume that this board has authority of law for its existence.

Mr. HENSLEY. It is self-created.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The advocates of a big navy are supreme on the Naval Committee. That committee has been built up in such a way, that the advocates of a moderate navy on that committee, struggle for their beliefs, and seek to bring out the facts, under the very greatest difficulties, and at the very greatest disadvantage.

I would like the gentleman to tell me how the attitude of gentlemen like myself, hinders him and his colleagues who constitute an overwhelming majority of the committee, from reporting four battleships in his bill? What compulsion can we put upon you? You say that I am in the way, and that men like me are in the way; then how have you been able to report two battleships? We are as much opposed to two battleships as we are to four. Why does the gentleman speak of the naval board as having authority, and then refuse to follow it?

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to say that every member of the Committee on Naval Affairs who signed this minority report voted for no battleships for the year 1913 with one exception, and that gentleman was out of town, or he would have voted for no battleships also. If we have no battleships at all, we do not need a naval board. That is true.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now what has the report of the feeble minority of 4 on your committee, to do with the recommendations of the majority, represented by the 17 other gentlemen? How could that minority, feeble as it is in numbers as compared with the 17 gentlemen who are sounding the tocsin of war, hinder you from reporting four battleships, if it was your desire so to do?

Mr. BRITTEN. The Secretary of the Navy recommended two battleships.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman did not ask me about the Secretary of the Navy. He asked me about the naval board, and the intimation carried in the question, was that that board was entitled to speak with authority.

Mr. BRITTEN. His information comes from the general board.

Mr. SAUNDERS. He did not follow the general board.

Mr. BRITTEN. Who passes the bill—the committee or the House?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The members of the Naval Committee ought to be superior to the naval board, to the Navy Secretary, and to the power of the administration, when it comes to doing your duty as members of that committee. Holding the views that you do as to the Navy General Board, you occupy a ridiculous attitude when you reject their recommendations and are contented to report a miserly and inadequate program calling for two battleships a year.

The question of national defense is not a matter of compromise. The security of the country is the supreme law; and whatever is necessary for the security of the country ought to be done, and ought to be voted for, and ought to be provided for, to the exclusion of everything else. That is the position of the advocates of a sufficient Navy, of which I have the honor to be one. You will agree to that, I believe.

Mr. BRITTEN. Do you get security from no battleships?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentlemen who voted for no battleships on the occasion referred to, voted for that proposition on the very sufficient ground that in their view we already had all the battleships that we needed, without providing for any more at that time.

Mr. BRITTEN. And the gentleman was one of those.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think not.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I have looked up the RECORD, and the gentleman voted for no battleships.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Very well, I cast a mighty good vote if I did. I do not think however that I voted that way in 1913. My recollection is that I voted for one battleship, but if the gentleman has ascertained that I voted for none, he has done me a kindness. He has found one vote in my record of which I am proud. [Applause.] I voted for none because we had provided for two the year before. Hence, there was no occasion to provide for any in the succeeding year.

Let us go a little further. I am able to justify my attitude because I am satisfied after full investigation that a program of two ships a year gives us more battleships than we need. But you big-navy people have not done your duty. If you think that this naval board is entitled to speak with authority, and to fix the naval policy of this country, you ought to follow them, and bow with deference to that authority.

As I said a moment ago, the national security is not a thing to be paltered with, it is not a question to be compromised. It is a proposition to be met fairly and squarely. The security of the Republic is the supreme law. The old Latins had a magnificent aphorism, Salus populi, suprema lex esto. I stand by that.

What does the average naval expert say with reference to the proper defense of our country? Adopting the view taken by gentlemen like the gentleman from Alabama, the provision for two battleships is so pitifully inadequate, that it is fully as deserving of criticism as a provision for none at all. Do you suppose that Mr. HOBSON is satisfied with two battleships? Why, I asked him on the floor of this House how many battleships he thought would be necessary to make us safe, and he said something like five a year. Either the naval board speaks with authority, or it may be disregarded. If it speaks with authority, then, you gentlemen who believe in it, can not falter, or take any middle ground. I do not believe in it, so I am not bound by its recommendations; not so with you gentlemen who recognize its authority. You do not do your duty to the country, nay you imperil the security of our country, when you fail to provide all the battleships that this board declares are necessary to preserve that security.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Alabama argued that we ought to maintain our equilibrium among the nations of the world.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, that is the new philosophy of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us what he thinks about that?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not care to go as far afield as that. I suppose even my friend from Illinois is hardly prepared to subscribe to that doctrine. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] will have to be spokesman for that doctrine on the floor of this House.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield now for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I agree thoroughly with what the gentleman has said to the effect that in the trouble in which we are now engaged, it appears that we have a sufficient Navy; but does not the gentleman know that this country is trembling to-day for fear of complications with foreign countries?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, I do not know anything of the sort. I for one am not trembling, and I do not believe the country generally is trembling.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. And within a few weeks this Congress has been asked to give away our plain rights in the Panama Canal for the purpose of appeasing foreign countries.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Are you afraid of foreign countries? Are you trembling with apprehension? Are you afraid of a foreign invasion of this country?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is it not true that almost every newspaper we read speaks of the danger of foreign invasion?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think the statesmen of this country, and the Representatives in this House, have come to a rather low ebb, if we are to be turned from the plain course of our duty, by unfounded statements contained in irresponsible, fire-eating, jingo newspapers. [Applause.] I have seen some of the matter referred to, and I wish to say that it makes me ashamed of the intelligence of the country, to be told that such stuff should make any lodgment on our minds.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I venture the suggestion that if there should be intervention by one of these larger powers, every man on the floor of this House would regret that he had not voted for more battleships.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Suppose we consider that suggestion. In case of intervention by Great Britain, Germany, and France in the pending controversy, what would our provision for two battleships a year amount to? Such intervention is a possibility. If you argue in that fashion, you ought to insist that our program should carry 20 dreadnaughts a year. Suppose that tomorrow Germany, France, and Great Britain should make common cause against the United States, what security would our pitiful program of two battleships a year afford? We might as well have none; since our present fleet would be destroyed, with the consequent loss of all the millions that had gone into its construction.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I know my friend will agree with me that we would put up a good fight, if we had not anything but a pole to fight with.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, yes. The gentleman can not make any issue with me on that. I have already stated that when it comes to war I would like to have an antagonist worthy of our steel, one that would put us to our mettle, and develop the real fighting blood that is in us. I have already made that statement.

Mr. CLINE. How does the naval board come to get into this question of how many battleships we shall have?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know, except perhaps to show that the Naval Committee has disregarded their recommendations.

Mr. CLINE. Did the Naval Committee send for the naval board?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know. It is referred to as a body of experts for whose opinion we ought to have regard. Yet the committee disregards them. The very gentlemen who are urging two battleships, are disregarding the recommendations of the naval board. Speaking of possibilities——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I noticed in the paper this morning, and I have seen it in several papers lately, and I presume the gentleman has also, that the Secretary of the Navy has issued rush orders to have the New York completed so that she may be sent to Mexican waters. I want to ask the gentleman, if there is no prospect of some complication abroad, what is the reason of the Secretary of the Navy for desiring more battleships to be sent to Mexican waters?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Probably the naval board suggested to him that it would be well to do it, I do not know.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Does the gentleman think that the Secretary of the Navy would issue a foolish order of that kind?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would not like to say that the Secretary of the Navy does foolish things, but he has done some things that I can not approve. Will that satisfy my friend? I want to say seriously that the environment of the Secretary of the Navy is such that it is hard for him to be other than the mouthpiece of the caste that surrounds him. While administrations come and administrations go, the environment of the Naval Secretary is always the same.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a friendly question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion on the matter of sending the entire fleet to Mexico at this particular time when, so far as I can see, there is not so very much to do except on the coast. Why is it all there?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It serves to show what a mighty naval power we are.

Mr. FESS. Show to whom?

Mr. SAUNDERS. To the world, I suppose. The advocates of one ship a year have insisted that we possess a mighty Navy. Now we have an ocular demonstration of the fact.

Mr. MADDEN. And this is a safe place, anyway.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, a very safe place. When the gentleman from Michigan asked me if we might not become involved with the nations of the world, he must have had in mind some combination of nations. Whenever you begin to argue for a big Navy upon the hypothesis of possible complications, there is no limit to the extent of naval construction that will thereby be imposed upon the country. It is possible that we may become involved over Mexico with a foreign power, it may be that we will be involved with two foreign powers, or possibly three foreign powers. One is as likely as the other. Having reference to these possibilities, what should be the program of naval construction?

I have been in this House long enough to see Japan as a possible adversary, worn threadbare. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON], when he first came to this House, and began to sound war's alarm, insisted that unless we built up such a Navy as he had in contemplation, it would be only a short while before this country would be involved in war with the Empire of the Rising Sun. Time has passed, and we are not only not at war with Japan, but we are farther away from war with that Empire than ever before. Japan is tottering on the verge of bankruptcy, and has materially reduced her naval program.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does not the gentleman know that the people of California can not enforce the school laws that they want because Japan has ruled otherwise, that they can not enact the land laws that the people want because they can not stand behind them, and the Secretary of State had to hurry to California to consult with the legislature?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Gentlemen have not the right to take the floor without the consent of the Chairman and the consent of the gentleman who holds the floor.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon if I have been speaking without his permission.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman had my permission.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has no right to interrupt without the permission of the Chair. In the last 25 minutes the Member who is addressing us has not spoken for 5 minutes without an interruption. We are entitled to hear the gentleman from Virginia. We can hear the other gentlemen anywhere in the lobby, or out on the street. What we want is information. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that our naval program from year to year depends largely on our financial condition?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. It depends upon a much higher consideration—the necessities of national defense. The American people should provide whatever is necessary for our security; the matter of dollars and cents should not enter into the question.

Mr. BRITTEN. One more question. It appears to me that the gentleman's attitude is very inconsistent.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think not.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no question but that the gentleman from Virginia voted for no battleships, and the other day he voted practically for a war resolution.

Mr. DONOVAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from Virginia yielded for a question, and the gentleman from Illinois is not asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia yielded to the gentleman from Illinois generally.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman from Illinois is seeking to develop an inconsistency in the gentleman from Virginia. [Laughter.] If I have been inconsistent, it was in a good cause, but I have not been inconsistent. I favor all the battleships that this country needs. To that extent I am in favor of a big navy. One ship a year gives us a big navy. We need no more. I wish to say in this connection, that I have been here long enough to hear the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] make a most able, impressive, comprehensive, and logical argument along the very lines followed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] a few days ago, namely, that Germany was not a menace to the United States. I listened with admiration to him, when he stood up boldly in front of the House, and in reply to the gentleman from Alabama who was making suggestions like those now made by the gentleman from Michigan, stated, "I am not scared." Those were brave words, but since that time, in some way, we have seen our friend from Tennessee become infected with that mysterious influence with which he said the gentleman from Alabama had inoculated a former President of the United States.

In other words, our friend is now overthrowing his own arguments, and supporting the arguments of his quondam adversary, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON]. How does he justify this reversal of attitude? President Wilson declares that many happy illustrations multiply about us of a growing sense of community of interest among the nations. This relates to the great nations of the world, not the small semi-barbarous States, with respect to which occasional wars requiring a small force, may be expected. I have seen another thing since I have been here. I have seen the sentiment for a big navy worked up in the most deliberate, and scientific fashion. Some one fires the train by stating that a foreign country is preparing to trample, or tread on the United States. Naturally that suggestion is irritating, and the country begins to bristle up a little. Then another actor in this comedy bobs up, and asks soldiers on the unprotected shores of the Atlantic coast? This inquiry causes us to further sit up, and take notice. Then another conspirator in this propaganda, rises to remark that Japan is preparing to occupy Magdalena Bay, and make it a great naval base. This suggestion sets the whole Pacific coast aflame, and the Representatives from that section are ready to vote for 100 battleships to protect them against Japan. A little later some one suggests that Russia is secretly preparing a great aerial fleet with which to destroy the Panama Canal, and wants to know what we are going to do about it? This suggestion starts a call for a great defensive aerial fleet to protect us against this antagonist, who is to fly across the stormy waters of the Atlantic. By this time the proper condition of alarm has been reached, and these skillful players pull out all the stops of pride, passion, and prejudice in the great organ of armed peace, and the volume of sound which they emit, straightway drowns out any still, small voices that fain would be heard for peace, or moderation.

In the view of the naval experts this country is not now, and at no period in its history, has ever been provided with either an adequate Army, or Navy, and yet we have managed somehow to bungle along, growing richer, and stronger, and greater, and more secure with each passing year. This matter of the naval board, is a very serious thing in the mind of my friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

If these people are entitled to the last word, if we must abdicate in their favor our position as custodians of the rights, dignity, security, honor, peace and protection of the American people, if we must turn over to this board the ultimate voice in determining what is necessary to be done, in order to adequately protect us against imminent dangers, if they are entitled to speak with authority, because they are fighting men, and, therefore, can adequately advise us what our policy should be, and how we may adequately protect ourselves, I ask you, I ask my colleagues in this House, whether we can afford to disregard this voice of authority, and to set up our poor, puny voices against them? The advocates of this bill say that it is a compromise between the views of the moderate naval people, and of the naval board. Is this a matter for compromise? Are the 17 members of this Naval Committee willing to compromise the security, the welfare, the future, the honor, and the dignity of the American people, by reporting two ships, when they ought to report four? Can you compromise a situation like this? Ought you to leave us in a state of insecurity, uncertainty, and alarm, when you have a board that tells you not only what you can do, but what you ought to do, in order that you may discharge your duty to your constituents, and preserve the integrity and welfare of the American people? I tell you, that the gentlemen who talk about this naval board, and the authority that its recommendations ought to carry, and then admit that they only believe one-half of what that board says, thereby do no credit either to the naval board, or to the 17 majority members of the committee. If the majority of the committee can weigh the arguments of this board, if it can reject 50 per cent of what they say, if it can present a bill for a less number of ships than this board recommends, then they admit by that action all I have undertaken to put forward in this matter, and that is, that after all has been said, the final voice in this great argument ought to be the voice of the American Congress, the voice of the American people, speaking through us, who are the servants of that people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, among other brave American lads who gave up their lives for their country at Vera Cruz on yesterday was Louis Oscar Fried, ordinary seaman, attached to the U. S. battleship Arkansas, aged 19 years, a resident of Gretna, La., which is in the congressional district that I have the honor to represent. It must be a source of mournful pride to his father and his family and his friends, as it is to me, to realize that he was the first southern boy to make the "great sacrifice" for his country in this unfortunate war. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of the pending bill to which but little attention has been directed during the course of the debate because of the keen criticism of some who are opposed to the naval program and who do not desire to see such great amounts as are recommended by the committee appropriated for battleships and for naval construction. It is most important that in the course of the discussion we should not lose sight of those features of the bill that have to do with navy yards and with things other than the construction of battleships and naval boats. It may not be necessary to remind the members of the committee that on Tuesday last the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], who represents the congressional district which has the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. in it, and again on yesterday the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], who represents a district with a private shipbuilding company in it, made criticism of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy and the Naval Affairs Committee because they have recommended on page 22 of the pending bill that the Boston and Philadelphia Navy Yards be equipped for shipbuilding. There is an item in this bill, I am most happy to say, appropriating $148,000 to equip Charlestown (Mass.) Navy Yard for shipbuilding. This amount of money, $148,000, was put into the naval bill of a year or two ago through the activities of some of us who were familiar with the conditions of the marine barracks and officers' quarters at the Charlestown Navy Yard, and in spite of the fact that it required unanimous consent in this body, that a single objection could have caused the legislation to fail, we were able to convince the Congress that $48,000 should be appropriated for officers' quarters at Charlestown Navy Yard and $100,000 should be appropriated for marine barracks at that place.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable Secretary of the Navy when he was inducted into office had his own ideas in regard to the mobilization of the Marine Corps at a point farther south than the Charlestown Navy Yard, and he told some of us that he believed it to be an unwise expenditure to go forward with the construction of the officers' quarters and the marine barracks that had been authorized in the naval bill. The reasonableness of his argument was so sound that, so far as we were concerned, we agreed that the money might be withheld from expenditure for a time at least until we might see how the Secretary's plan should work out. It is this amount of money, $148,000, already appropriated by the Congress for the building of officers' quarters and marine barracks that the Naval Affairs Committee recommends toward the equipment of the Charlestown Navy Yard for shipbuilding. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] spoke at length on this item, just as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING] did, and they objected to the proposition on the score that it is unwise to have shipbuilding at Boston. They say that mechanics and workmen at Boston are paid 25 per cent more in wages than workmen and mechanics in any other place along the Atlantic seacoast. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of surprise to me to know that the wages of the Boston mechanics and workmen are so much higher than the wages of men in other places. I can not challenge the statement that was made by those gentlemen, because I have not the wage schedules, but I know that workmen in the Boston yards and in the private shipbuilding company at Boston challenge this statement in regard to comparative wages.

If they are paid 25 per cent more wages than the workmen in other places I am sorry to know that this condition exists in those places, because certainly we believe that the wages of the workmen at Boston are not now too high but rather too low. The objection is made that Boston ought not to be equipped for shipbuilding because the climate there is not so good for this work as the climate in other places along the seaboard. Objection is made by the gentleman from Virginia that we have so much rain at some times and so much snow at other times in the year that the climate there is not good for this kind of work, and, therefore, the Boston workmen and shipbuilding plants are at a disadvantage. It is an old, old thing to charge that the climate of Boston has many different kinds and varieties. It is a thing that is frequently referred to by humorists that the climate of Boston is the worst in the world and the most variable in the world. I have read, indeed, the witty things that Mark Twain said, with characteristic American humor, as to the climate of New England; but, Mr. Chairman, I never thought I would live to a time when in the American Congress it would be seriously asserted that the climate in Boston was the cause of withholding an amount of money to equip that place for shipbuilding purposes. I do not believe it is fair to say that the climate of Boston is not so good as the climate in Norfolk or at any place as far south as Washington for shipbuilding or any other kind of actual labor. Certainly I have always been more comfortable in the summer time in Boston than I ever have been in the summer time here in Washington, and any man who has had to do actual hustling work in each of the two places, as Members of Congress surely have to do, may bear me out in this statement in regard to comparative climatic conditions.

The gentleman from Virginia is a friend of the naval experts, because he rests his case largely on the proposition that the naval experts recommend a contract with a private company. The Secretary of the Navy is criticized by some of my colleagues because he is willing at times to follow the advice of the naval experts; he is criticized by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING], and by other men, because he fails in this matter to follow the recommendations of the naval experts. Mr. Chairman, I have seen some Secretaries of the Navy, have watched their conduct of the great Naval Establishment of the Government. May I digress for a moment to say I have never known a greater Secretary of the Navy than the present Secretary, Josephus Daniels. I commend him because he listens to naval experts and to all who may advise him, and then he acts as he believes he should act for the national welfare. Some refer to him as an extravagant man. Let me tell you some of the great economies that he has practiced in the short time since he has been at the head of that department. It is not necessary to tell the men who are on the Committee on Naval Affairs, because they know full well that he saved as a result of competition in regard to the matter of some armor-piercing shells more than a million of dollars—in exact language $1,068,750. It is not necessary to tell those men that in the contract for building ship No. 39, which is now under construction, he was able to save on special-treatment steel $378,261. The gentleman from Mississippi knows as a result of his attendance on the hearings of the Committee on Naval Affairs that on the item of turbine rotor drums of battleship 39 he was able to effect a saving of $102,836; that on medium steel plates, battleship 39, he was able to effect a saving of $19,000; that on angle irons and small iron and steel material for battleship 39 he was able to save $3,000; on forgings and shaftings, battleship 39, he was able to effect a saving of $157,646.

A total saving, Mr. Chairman, on this single battleship as against battleship No. 34 of $662,743, which is exclusive of the saving of $782,117 which they saved on armor of various kinds. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Navy has told graphically in the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House that he effected these savings by establishing competition between these private shipbuilding companies. He told there in most eloquent style that he requested the representatives of the private shipbuilding companies and of the armor-plate companies to come to Washington, and that he told them the law required them to make affidavit that they were not in any combination or in any agreement to keep up the price, and asked them if they were mindful of that law. These men told him that they knew of the law and that they had not had any conference before they submitted their bids. And yet the bids of three different companies which were submitted for the armor for this battleship were identical, and the Secretary, when he received the assurance that they had not compared notes, told them that when three large companies, with contracts amounting to very large sums, made identical bids to a cent the burden of proof was on them to show that they had not conferred about the matter.

Mr. Chairman, anyone who reads the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy before the Naval Affairs Committee must know the reason why the Secretary recommends that these yards be equipped for shipbuilding purposes. It must be because there is collusion between the private contractors, and he feels that the Government of the United States ought not to be at the mercy of any combination of men engaged in private shipbuilding enterprise.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman think the Government would save that amount of money in a Government armor-plate plant?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Of course I do, and so does the Secretary of the Navy, for he says so. The reason they would save is this: You have got to have either one of two things in this country, competition between men who are engaged in private enterprise based on the old economic idea of the law of supply and demand, or ownership by the Government of plants that will guarantee competition. If you have real earnest competition, that competition will be sufficient to regulate these matters without Government interference; but if you have in the land, as we see in this instance, collusive bidding instead of competitive bidding, if we see three great companies submit identical bids to the Government of the United States for armor plate, for shipbuilding, for things which the Government needs, you know there is no competition, you know there is no accidental identity between these various bids, but that there is collusion; and you know that the Government of the United States in order to get away from the results of that kind of collusive bidding, and in order that it may not be put at the mercy, Mr. Chairman, of these men who are engaged in these things, not from patriotic purposes but for the profit that may accrue to them, must equip its own navy yards for shipbuilding and build its own armor-plate factory. And in the end the cost is bound to be less than it would be if the Government was at the mercy of these collusive bidders.

Mr. BARTON. The Secretary was criticized some for buying supplies abroad. Was it not the only possible way he could get these supplies at reduced prices?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Of course it was.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts intend to be understood as saying that any gentleman who stands with ourselves withholds his indorsement of the Secretary for all these things that he did for the purpose of reducing these things?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. No. I thank the gentleman for asking the question. I am directing my thought particularly to the gentlemen who have spoken—the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING]. I know that the gentleman from Missouri and his colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON], and those who join with them on the committee and who are trying to get real economies, are in sympathy with the Secretary in this work, because these men are sincere and earnest in their desires to reduce the burden of taxation that is now resting so heavily on the people of this country. They realize that the Secretary is doing these things in a sincere effort to establish real economy and are in active cooperation with him.

We have seen one great political revolution in this country on the proposition of the high cost of living. I have seen the time when the annual budget of the city of Boston amounted to more than $20,000,000. I have seen the State taxes of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts mount up to $8,000,000, as they were last year, and almost certain to be increased to $10,000,000 this year.

The national budget is now considerably more than $1,000,000,000. I am not one of those who protest against large expenditures simply because they are large. But I wonder how long it is going to be before there will be a political revolution on the proposition, not of the high cost of living, which we have already seen, but on the proposition of the high cost of government, which we surely can see if we will just look at the figures. There may be places where it is wise, where it is the proper thing, where it is the duty of a Representative to protest against expenditure; but, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that those who protest against this expenditure of $148,000 for the equipment of the navy yard at Boston for shipbuilding purposes are not real economists, but rather are basing their arguments on a proposition that will not meet the measure of discussion and analysis that I hope it will be given in debate on this bill under the five-minute rule. The control of prices is a most important consideration in this matter. The Secretary points out that if he allows the Navy Department and the Government of the United States to be put at the mercy of the men who control the prices of these things, they will be able to run those prices up to suit themselves. But he says if there are Government yards equipped to do this shipbuilding in competition with private companies, then there will not be a surrendering of the control of prices by the Navy Department, but rather there will be a retaining of control of prices, and we shall have real competitive bidding for these ships and not the collusive bidding that we fear.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say one further thing about this matter. There are those who seem to believe that the equipment of this yard for shipbuilding purposes means simply its equipment for great battleship construction. I suppose we may hope in the course of time to see a battleship constructed there, just as battleships have been constructed in the New York Navy Yard and at other places. But I wonder if these men are mindful of the extent and the number of ships of one kind and another that are needed and used by the United States Government in its various departments.

Let me direct the attention of gentlemen to these tables that show the extent of work done in navy yards on ships of the War Department, the Treasury Department, and of other departments of the Government during the year 1912:

[1] Work not completed. [2] No estimates were submitted on many job orders in connection with this work, it having been authorized in advance.

MEMORANDUM.

From: The Aid for Materiel.
To: The Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: Work done at various navy yards on vessels belonging to other departments.

FEBRUARY 25, 1913.

1. There are forwarded herewith data sheets showing the amount of work done in the various navy yards on vessels of other departments of the Government during the calendar year 1912. Since January 1, 1913, the following additional work of this nature has been undertaken or authorized in the various yards, showing increased activity along these lines since the inauguration of the policy approved by the President on December 10, 1912:

Vessel.	Navy yard.	Number of days' work in—			Probable date of completion.
		Equipment.	Steam engineering.	Construction, ordnance, and repair.
Light Vessel No. 41	Boston		36	18	Indefinite.
Light Vessel No. 85	do		(1)		Completed.

Madrono	do		25	20	Feb. 28, 1913.
Light Vessel No. 70	do		25	20	Do.

[1] Install air compressor. [2] Renew propeller. [3] Docking.

2. In addition to the foregoing there is being built at Mare Island, Cal., a 67-foot vessel for the Revenue-Cutter Service; at Puget Sound, Wash., 3 gasoline launches for the use of the Agricultural Department in Alaskan waters; and at the navy yard, Boston, 3 motor dories for the Lighthouse Establishment.

Several of those ships are ships that are assigned to the Treasury Department. Several are in the Lighthouse Service and in the Revenue-Cutter Service and in the Public Health Service, engaged in every kind of service where any department needs vessels that are not battleships in any sense of the word. They are vessels of peace and not vessels of war.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Has the gentleman any data before him that would indicate the difference in price if the work that he mentions had been done in a private shipbuilding yard?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. No; I have not; but I understand——

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is satisfied it was done more cheaply at the navy yards?

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman that it was largely repair work, not construction work. In these cases bids are usually asked for in the first instance for this repair work, and if the bids are lower in the private shipbuilding companies' yards than in the Government yards, it is the custom, I understand, to allow that work to be done by the private companies. The opening of the Panama Canal will certainly cause many ships of the Navy to be kept on the west coast to a greater extent than they have been in the past, and that will cause the repair work on these ships to be done on the west coast rather than on the east coast.

The time has come, Mr. Chairman, when the very existence of the navy yard at Charlestown, Mass., and the future of that navy yard must be determined. For a great many years—practically from the days of the Civil War—the Charlestown Navy Yard has been a repair yard rather than a yard for construction work. The vast amount of work that has been done in that yard has been done in repairs on ships assigned to Charlestown as their home station. If some of these ships are taken away and kept on the west coast, the Charlestown Navy Yard will not be available for their repair.

The property the Government has there is worth more than $16,000,000, and many millions of dollars in addition have been expended during the history of the country for maintenance. The location of the yard is right at the very head of Boston Harbor, at the confluence of the Mystic and the Charles Rivers, and it takes a very large water-front area right in the most desirable place, where shipping and commercial activity might be had.

Mr. Chairman, if that yard is to be continued only as a repair yard, certainly it is going to be a place where only a few hundred workingmen will be employed and where there will be not much industrial activity. There is a tremendous sentiment against allowing that yard to be given back to private enterprise and to be used for commercial activities.

I know that this is so, because since I entered Congress in 1911 the Navy board recommended that the Charlestown Navy Yard should be discontinued and that a great naval base ought to be established at Narragansett Bay, R. I. I had my own ideas on the matter, and I knew that, from my own personal point of view, that change ought not to be made; but I realized that my duty is to be a Representative in Congress, and so, rather than reflect my own personal ideas in regard to the matter, I sent out a circular letter to everybody in the district which I have the honor to represent, asking them for an expression of opinion as to whether or not this navy yard should be continued or whether the vast area there should be made available for commercial activity and for water-front development. Mr. Chairman, I only state the facts when I say that of the thousands of replies I received less than a dozen letters came back to me favoring the change from a governmental yard to a place of commercial activity and private enterprise. The reasons that were given were most varied and most eloquent in the expression of a general opinion that that yard ought to be utilized almost entirely for the Navy. The terms in which those letters were expressed were not the naval terms. Perhaps they were not couched in the kind of language that the men of the naval board would use in expressing their ideas, because the letters were free from technicalities. But reasons of almost every kind were given, and it was a most instructive thing to me to use that referendum method of finding out what Boston people think about the matter, and I believe it would be instructive to the men of this committee if they could read some of the letters that I received.

The time has come, then, when the yard can not be continued solely as a repair yard, and if it is to be further used as a navy yard it must be equipped for shipbuilding purposes; not for the building of great battleships alone, but for the building of the various kinds of Government ships that can well be built there—the ships for the Lighthouse Service, the ships for the Revenue-Cutter Service, the ships for the Public Health Service, the ships for the various kinds of governmental activities that we have come to need in the conduct of this great business enterprise, the Government of the United States.

I congratulate the Secretary of the Navy that he has made the recommendation, because I know it is a matter of wise economy. In the recent special election that was held in Massachusetts we had to meet the proposition that "the South is in the saddle" in the control of the Navy Department and of the various departments of the Government. My colleague [Mr. ROGERS] made a speech a few weeks ago that may be remembered by some of you, when he pointed to the fact that a southern gentleman was in control of this and that and the other department, and he said that the people of New England would not get a square deal in regard to the conduct of these governmental activities. Mr. Chairman, let me briefly say we had Moody of Massachusetts in the Navy Department, we had Meyer of Massachusetts in the Navy Department. Neither one of them would recommend the equipment of the Charlestown, Mass., yard for shipbuilding purposes; but when we had a southern gentleman, Josephus Daniels, in that department, the recommendation was made; and is now reported to this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union by the Naval Affairs Committee, and I hope it will soon be enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, from the earliest days of American history the men of Massachusetts have been interested deeply in shipping and in shipbuilding.

Previous to the establishment of the Charlestown Navy Yard a number of vessels had been built in the vicinity of Boston, several of which subsequently became well known. In the very earliest days of the settlement the importance of ships was recognized, and as early as 1629 we find records of six shipwrights having been sent out from London. Gov. Winthrop, who reached Boston Bay in 1630, records in 1631 the launch of the Blessing of the Bay, the first ship of the infant colony, and on August 9 of that year states: "The governor's bark, being of 30 tons, went to sea." This small vessel was later converted into a cruiser against pirates and may, therefore, lay claim to the honor of having been the first American vessel of war.

The Massachusetts was built at Germantown, a promontory in the town of Quincy, in 1789. The frigate Constitution, launched in 1797, was built at Hartt's shipyard on the site now known as Constitution Wharf, and the frigate Boston (the second of that name) was launched from the same yard in 1799.

It was undoubtedly the work already accomplished in shipbuilding, as well as the importance of the settlement and the facilities offered by the harbor, that suggested Charlestown as a desirable location for a navy yard.

On January 25, 1797, a resolution was reported from the Naval Committee of the House recommending the establishment of a Government dockyard. There seems to have been no direct authority from Congress to purchase a site or build a dockyard; but, on February 25, 1799, an act was passed authorizing the building of six ships of war of not less than 74 guns each, and appropriating $1,000,000 for this purpose. Hon. Benjamin Stoddard, then Secretary of the Navy, recommended the purchase of the site, which was approved by the President. The earliest record of the transaction was a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, dated June 2, 1800, to Dr. Aaron Putnam, of Charlestown—who appears to be the agent selected for negotiating the purchase—stating:

> It is desirable, for the purpose of establishing a navy yard for building ships or vessels of war at or in the vicinity of Boston, to purchase, on account of the United States, from 10 to 50 acres of land if it can be obtained on reasonable terms.

And inclosing a list of the property referred to amounting to about 47½ acres. A later letter from the Secretary to Dr. Putnam, dated August 13, 1800, states:

> The President having determined that the 47½ acres of ground at Charlestown described in the plat herewith sent should be purchased for a ship and dock yard, I have the honor to request, upon satisfying yourself of the goodness of the titles, you will make the purchase, taking deeds to the United States for same, which, after having recorded, you will be pleased to send to me. * * * I have already remitted you $10,000 on this account, and will remit the residue when I am informed you want it.

In accordance with the above letter the first site of the Charlestown yard was purchased, the original purchase amounting to about 34½ acres, and the purchase price being about $37,356. Further purchases were made, as follows: In 1817, from Isaac Hull, 5,186 square feet, for $3,889.50; in 1862, from Oakman & Eldridge, 115,210½ square feet, for $123,100; and in 1867, from A. Hull, 2¾ perches, for $7,000. The amount purchased, with the filling in of the marshes and flats, made, in 1880, 87½ acres; and with the extension of harbor line and further filling in since that time makes the present area of the yard proper about 111 acres, of which 80 acres are land and 31 acres water.

The first commandant of the yard was Capt. (afterwards commodore) Samuel Nicholson, who remained in office until his death, December 29, 1811. The records show but very few improvements in the yard up to this time. The commandant's house, afterwards the old museum, was built prior to 1808, the exact date not being recorded. There were also erected a brick store, marine barracks, a hospital, a powder magazine, a wharf, and a few temporary sheds.

Commodore Bainbridge was the next commandant, and he took a very active interest in the affairs of the yard and vicinity, surveying the harbor and recommending improvements, but the appropriations were very meager, the expenditures for accommodations and improvements at the yard in 1811 and 1812 amounting to but $5,742.43, although during the year 1812 13 vessels received repairs amounting to $245,225.13. The first vessel launched at the yard was the sloop of war Frolic, on September 11, 1813, and the next was the Independence, on September 22, 1814, and from that time up to the commencement of the Civil War 21 vessels in all were launched at the yard.

Among these were several of historic fame—the Cumberland, which was sunk by the Confederate ironclad Virginia—Merrimac—in Hampton Roads in March, 1862; the Merrimac, the first steam frigate launched for our Navy was built at the yard in 1854–55. The history of this vessel need hardly be told to any American—how she was left at the navy yard, Norfolk, in 1861, and converted by the Confederates into an ironclad and created such havoc with our vessels until she was defeated by the little Monitor in 1862 and was afterwards destroyed by the Confederates.

On January 1, 1858, the keel of the historic ship Hartford, the flagship of Admiral Farragut, was laid, and she was launched in November of that year.

The cost of improvements at the yard up to 1859, including the cost of site and dry dock No. 1, which was built in 1827–1833, amounted to $3,671,521.

During the Civil War there was great activity at the yard, and between 1861 and 1866 39 vessels of war were built and 43 purchased vessels were equipped; the number of vessels repaired, provisioned, and so forth, is up in the hundreds. At times there were as many as 5,000 men employed. The Monadnock, a double-turreted monitor, launched in 1864, was the first vessel of the kind to go from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, arriving at Mare Island in 1866, and being afterwards rebuilt and converted into the vessel now of the same name.

In 1874 the iron torpedo boat Intrepid was launched at the yard and was the first vessel of that kind added to our Navy.

From 1832 to 1880, inclusive, $10,618,716 was expended for general maintenance of the yard. This does not include the expenditures on ships built or repaired or pay of workmen employed on them. Only one vessel, a small training ship, the Cumberland, has been built at the yard since that time.

From 1880 until about 1900 very little was done to improve the buildings in the yard, but from 1900 on until the present time remodeling and building has been continuous.

The estimated value of the property on June 30, 1913, was $16,211,678. This includes only the property, buildings, and plant in the yard proper, and not the value of the hospital and other outlying branches of the station.

The old ship houses have been razed and modern shops or buildings have taken their places. With the addition of a few large tools the yard would be fitted for a first-class repair station. The capacity for such work would be limited, however, by the berthing space, and as any extended increase in this space would not only require very heavy expenditures, but would conflict with the maritime interests of the port, development in this line would be difficult. If therefore the full capacity of the yard is to be utilized, shipbuilding must be resorted to, and fortunately the yard is susceptible to such development without extravagant expenditure.

A recent report of the board of inspections for shore stations contains the following statements in regard to the facilities at hand for such development:

The yard possesses an available site for building ways. This site is situated between the ship fitters' shop and the electrical shop, the latter building being also used as a storage house for electrical supplies as well as for the storage of anchors and chains. At the head of the projected ways is the forge shop, and only a few hundred feet to the westward is the group of shops of the machinery division. As regards therefore its relative location to the principal industrial shops of the yard the site possesses distinct advantages.

Necessary retaining walls, cranes, crane runways, together with pneumatic, electric, water, and steam lines, would likewise have to be provided. The yard authorities estimated that an expenditure of about $130,000 would provide all equipment and improvements essential to the fitting up of building ways adequate for the construction of a collier.

The site now reserved for recreation grounds and recommended by the above-mentioned board to be used for a third dry dock could also be utilized for building ways for larger vessels. Upon the completion of the 1,000-foot dock projected by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts the necessity for using this space for a dock would be considerably diminished.

Following the history of this yard, we find that one of the reasons for the original selection of its location was the fact that it had been demonstrated that the necessary facilities and talent were then at hand. The War of 1812 demonstrated the fact that the art of shipbuilding had not been lost by the workmen in that vicinity. Again, during the Civil War the resources of the yard were severely taxed and the response was such that the Nation may feel that high interest was paid on the money invested.

During the latter period as high as 5,000 men were employed, although the facilities were not half what they are to-day. We find at the present time that a varying force of from 1,300 to 1,800 men is employed, not half utilizing the increased industrial facilities. The effect of this variation in the working force is bad in every way—for the employees in having irregular employment, breeding dissatisfaction and frequently causing distress to honest, hard-working men; for the Government, loss of efficiency, due to deterioration of plant and force, owing to lack of work and the dissatisfaction of employees. The history of this yard calls for some consideration for its employees. One of the means of maintaining a steady working force is by having new construction work (shipbuilding) done at the yard, and it would be to the interest of the Government to place such work at the yard instead of doing it by outside contract, even if the price was higher. But when bids were opened in December, 1913, for a supply ship, the bid of the Charlestown Navy Yard was found to be below all others, navy yards or private establishments.

To build this vessel at the yard it will be necessary to provide a building slip, for which a site is available, as stated above, and a provision for this purpose appropriating $148,000 has been inserted in the pending naval appropriation bill. This will mean a permanent improvement to the yard, with practically no expense to the Government, as the bid of this yard for the supply ship in question was more than this amount below that of any private firm.

When the Panama Canal is opened and the fleet passes through to the Pacific coast, the amount of repair work for the yards on this side will be greatly reduced, and it is vital to the interests of the Boston yard that they should have other work to keep the men employed. The Government can not afford to have these men scattered and the force disorganized, and surely the record of Massachusetts men who have built so many of the vessels that have made Americans proud of their Navy deserves some consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] to consume the remainder of his time.

Mr. HENSLEY. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON].

Mr. BUTLER. Before the gentleman yields, I wish to say that on the Republican side there remain about 40 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] will follow the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON]. He will occupy 12 minutes, and I desire to give the balance of the time, 28 minutes, to the chairman of the committee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield two minutes to me before that?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom I agreed to assign the time, says that he will cheerfully give the gentleman two minutes. So I will then yield 26 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] is recognized for 1 hour and 17 minutes.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I ought to apologize to the House for trespassing any longer on your patience, because I have had more than my share of the time already.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum. I think we should have a quorum here to listen to Judge WITHERSPOON.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. PADGETT. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. It will take half an hour, and it will make Judge WITHERSPOON'S speech rather late in the day.

Mr. KEATING. I think it is quite essential, Mr. Chairman, that we have a quorum here when Judge WITHERSPOON addresses the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). There are 53 Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk began the calling of the roll.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, if I may withdraw the point of no quorum, I will do it.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can not do that now. The gentleman can not interrupt the roll call.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. UNDERWOOD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the naval appropriation bill, found itself without a quorum, and had caused the roll to be called; that 249 Members had answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present, and the committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] is recognized for 1 hour and 17 minutes.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I was about to apologize to the committee for trespassing again upon its patience, and I want to state that my excuse for this is that I have seen the newspapers and magazines of the country and learned from them and from talking with people everywhere that there is so much misconception about the American Navy that I have been deeply impressed with the importance of at least the House of Representatives knowing the facts about it. I have spent several months in gathering up the facts, and I feel it my duty to give my colleagues in this House the benefit of what little I have learned. When I closed my remarks of last Saturday I had just demonstrated, as I claim, the superiority of the battleship Oregon in every particular to every battleship in the German Navy.

In addition to that, I want to call your attention to the fact that while we have not tested lately the Oregon, yet we have tested a ship that is far inferior to it. We have made a test of one of the monitors, the Tallahassee. This was done at the request and under the direction of the Naval Affairs Committee, and we know from observation what that boat can do. There had been some question raised as to whether the armor-piercing shells that we use are effective. We are spending millions of dollars for them, and have been for many years, and some question has been raised as to whether it is an effective shell, and in order to demonstrate whether it is or not we made a test, and we used the Tallahassee, one of these monitors that they do not count as an American ship, to test that question.

If that test was bona fide and honest and fair, then that ship was a representative ship of the American Navy. What the result of that test was is regarded as a secret, and I shall not give you the details of it. But when Admiral Strauss was before the Naval Affairs Committee, and he is the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, I asked him what his judgment about that test was, and he said it demonstrated the power and efficiency of these shells and guns that were used on these monitors. I asked him this question: I said, "Admiral, if a modern dreadnaught had been in the place of that target when the Tallahassee was shooting at it, what would have been the result?" He said, "It would have been put out of action." I asked him how long it would have taken the Tallahassee to put the dreadnaught out of action if it had been in the place of a target, and he said, "A very short while."

Admiral Vreeland told us that the Oregon and the Indiana and the Massachusetts were more efficient ships than the Tallahassee is. That is the testimony of these naval experts, upon whom the Secretary of the Navy says that he relies.

Now, I want you to understand also that while they come here and tell you that the Oregon and the Indiana and the Massachusetts are old, obsolete, worn out, inefficient ships, that the Navy Department does not exclude them from comparison in comparing navies on the ground that they are old, obsolete, and inefficient. It states plainly and clearly in the Navy Yearbook the reason why it excludes them. It is under an arbitrary rule that they have adopted which declares that no ship shall be counted unless it was launched within 20 years, unless within the last 5 years it has been reconstructed and rearmed. It is under this arbitrary rule. The Navy Department seems to regard the launching as very important. Now, I asked Admiral Vreeland when he was on the stand to tell us what was the real test of superiority between two navies. He said types, numbers, and men. I said, "Suppose the German officers and sailors were exactly equal to ours in every respect, then does not it all depend on the destructive power of the guns?" Well, he says, "Yes." I said, "It makes no difference what is the type of the vessel, the number of the vessel, the style of the vessel, the tonnage of the vessel, the speed of the vessel, if the men on the vessel have not the skill to make the shells hit and the shells have not the destructive force when they do hit, all these other things amount to nothing." And he said, "That is certainly true." It was not necessary for a naval expert to say that to any man who will use his reason about it. Then I said, "Admiral, the whole question depends on the skill of our men and the destructive power of the guns." He said, "That is certainly true."

Yet it is the age of the ship from the launching that the Navy Department has made the test. They have not followed the advice of their own experts in this particular.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. SHARP. When was the Tallahassee reconstructed, if it has been?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The Tallahassee has never been reconstructed, but the Oregon and the Massachusetts and the Indiana have.

Mr. SHARP. When was the Tallahassee constructed?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I will tell the gentleman about that.

Mr. SHARP. I ask because I saw that great demonstration myself, and saw all these shells fired, and I was curious to know when the Tallahassee was constructed.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The Indiana was kept in the navy yard two years, the Oregon five years and five months, and the Massachusetts four years and four months, and on the three ships they have expended in reconstruction nearly $6,000,000. If I recollect correctly, the reconstruction was completed in 1910 and 1911.

Mr. SHARP. When was the Tallahassee built?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I think about 1898. I am not sure about that. It is not nearly so old as these other boats. I asked the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance why it was when they expended $6,000,000 reconstructing these three ships if their guns were defective that they did not then put new guns on them—modern guns. His answer was not that they could not do it. He did not suggest there was any difficulty about doing it, but his answer was that at that time we had not discovered that it was necessary.

These great naval experts had not found out in 1910 and 1911 that the guns of the Oregon, the Massachusetts, and the Indiana had any defects about them at all. They have just discovered that within late years, since there has been such a movement and uprising all over the world to stop this battleship folly. So I say that there is no reason why these ships should be excluded; but no Member of this House yet, so far as I have heard, has attempted to answer the demonstration that the Oregon, the Indiana, and the Massachusetts are superior in every respect to every one of the 20 German battleships. And if you want to believe that they are not effective war vessels, if you do not think that a ship carrying a gun that will penetrate 11.76 inches of Krupp steel at a distance of 12,000 yards is a good fighting ship—if you do not believe that, then at least I can appeal to your patriotism to be fair to your own country and to exclude every German ship that is not equal to her. [Applause.] And if you do that, you will knock out 20 of the German battleships and leave the two fleets with 36 American battleships and 19 German battleships. [Applause.]

I call your attention again to the fact that in order to juggle the figures and minimize the American Navy, in the Navy Yearbook they have divided them into three classes—battleships, dreadnaughts, and cruisers. I have already discussed the battleship division. I call your attention to the second class, the dreadnaughts, and if you will get the Navy Yearbook of 1913 and look on page 832 you will find there a list of the German ships—dreadnaughts—on one page, and ours right opposite to it on page 833, and you will find that they have a list of German ships, dreadnaughts, numbering 17, and a list of American dreadnaughts numbering 12, in order to make it appear to anyone who examines that book that our dreadnaught fleet is far inferior to the German dreadnaught fleet.

This is accomplished in two ways, first, by taking two particular dreadnaughts out of our list and putting them in the common battleship list above. I refer to the South Carolina and to the Michigan. That is one way in which it is accomplished. The other is to take four German ships, the Nassau, the Westfalen, the Posen, and the Rheinland, which are really battleships, out of the battleship class and put them in the dreadnaught class, and by taking some of ours out and putting more of Germany's in they make a longer list of German dreadnaughts than they do for American dreadnaughts. I want to call attention to the facts about that. They say the Michigan and the South Carolina are not dreadnaughts. If you will examine the list of battleships and dreadnaughts, as given in all the authorities that are ever published in any country in the world, you will find this to appear on its face as the difference between a battleship and a dreadnaught. In the old battleship class you will see four big guns, and all the balance of its main armament small guns. In a dreadnaught class you will see all of the main armament consisting of big guns and no small guns, and that is the difference between the two. The Michigan and the South Carolina have all big guns. Their main battery consists solely of eight 12-inch guns each, and that makes them dreadnaughts, and every man who tells you they are not dreadnaughts is either showing that he does not know what a dreadnaught is or he is trying to fool you, one or the other.

Now, I have stated and I can prove that the South Carolina and the Michigan are not only dreadnaughts, but they are the first dreadnaughts designed and planned. Now, it is a common idea that England built the first dreadnaught. She built the ship that is called Dreadnaught, which has given the name to the entire class, but before she had built that ship or designed it the genius of the American Navy had designed and planned the Michigan and the South Carolina, and England and all other countries have patterned after us in that as in everything else that is good. [Applause.] Now, I want to show you what foreign authorities say about that. I read first from the Naval Pocketbook, giving the navies of the world for the year 1913, just out, and on page 391 it gives a description of the South Carolina and the Michigan, and then at the bottom of the page it has these words:

> These ships were designed before the Dreadnaught. They are, therefore, the first all big-gun ships.

That is what this foreign authority says about it. Now, I would call your attention to Janes's Fighting Ships, where it says about it——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman state for the information of the House, if you please, the speed and the tonnage of the Michigan and the South Carolina?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Oh, yes; I will state that. They are ships that have a tonnage of 17,617 tons, according to this book. That is the full-load displacement and the normal tonnage is 16,000 tons; and since my friend has asked me that question, whenever you prove that the American Navy is superior to the German Navy, whenever you bring up facts to demonstrate our superiority, then the battleship crowd begin to talk about tons and speed. You do not shoot tons, you shoot shells at the enemy. [Applause.] Speed is a thing that enables you to get away. I admit that the ships of other countries can outrun the Oregon and the Michigan, because many of them are built upon the principle that "he who fights and runs away may live to fight another day." [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Not right now. But I have never detained you on the question of speed and tonnage. I have tried to address you on something that amounts to something. That has nothing to do with it. Talk about speed, you just as well say that a bulldog can not whip a greyhound because he can not catch him. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman suggests foreign ships can get away from the Oregon; can the Oregon get away from foreign ships?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. She does not want to.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentlemen want her to be sunk?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No, sir; the Oregon does not belong to that class that wants to get away.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman has not yet stated the speed of the South Carolina and Michigan.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Oh, you can put it at 10 or 15 knots; you can put it at 10 knots if you want to do so; I do not care what the speed is. Whenever you get ready for the Oregon to go out on the sea and sink the ships of the enemy I want her to be as long getting there as possible. I take no pride in the hurry and the haste of destroying what belongs to other countries.

Now, so far as the Oregon running, the man who asked that question does not understand about battleships. It is not like getting into a fight with a fellow, and you find he is getting the best of you and, finding there is no chance for you, you take to your heels. Then, that is a question of speed, but it is not so with a battleship. If a battleship wants to run, no other battleship that has anybody but a lunatic to manage it is going to pursue it. If it does, it will be destroyed by torpedoes. The great trouble about torpedoes is they have not been developed up to the point where they can probably reach the ships of an enemy in battle range. Say two fleets are fighting at 6 miles apart. We have no torpedoes where one could shoot at the other and do any great damage, but if one ship is running and the other is pursuing it, the ship that is fleeing could shoot its torpedoes at the other 6 miles away, because a fast ship goes nearly as fast as a torpedo, and it would meet the torpedo half way and be destroyed by it. There is absolutely nothing in all this talk about ships running. Whenever they go out to battle they are going to fight, and ours are going to fight until they win or go down to the bottom of the sea.

Mr. LEVY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. Is it not a fact that we have more large guns than has the Germany Navy?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Oh, yes, sir; it is a fact. I have stated that repeatedly.

Mr. LEVY. The number is nearly doubled.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I have stated that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi that certain of our dreadnaughts have been called battleships in the authority that he referred to, and certain of the German battleships have been called dreadnaughts, and then you have been asked about the tonnage of our dreadnaughts, which have been improperly styled battleships, and you have given that tonnage. Can you give us the tonnage of these German battleships that have been improperly called dreadnaughts? It would form an interesting comparison.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Their tonnage is a little larger, 18,900, and if a ship becomes a dreadnaught on account of its tonnage, the Mauretania and the Lusitania are the greatest dreadnaughts on earth. [Laughter.] There is not any sense in the tonnage business, and I do not want to waste any more time on it.

I have read you what the Naval Pocket Book says of the Michigan and South Carolina. Janes's "Fighting ships of the world" says that these ships were laid down and projected before the British dreadnaughts, and so they may be considered the first dreadnaughts—that is, all big-gun ships. On page 176 this author describes these two dreadnaughts and then uses this language:

Authorized 1905. These ships, though laid down after, were projected before the British dreadnaught and so may be considered as the first dreadnaughts (i. e., all big-gun ships).

That is what this authority says about it. Now, they are not only regarded as dreadnaughts by all foreign authorities, but I want to say this to you, that the Navy Department knows they are dreadnaughts, and if you will take a Navy Yearbook of 1912, just one year before they found out they were not dreadnaughts, and look on page 788, you will see the list of our dreadnaughts there, and the first two ships given in that list are the Michigan and the South Carolina, put there by the Navy Department. [Applause.] So I say, they know that they are dreadnaughts. Now, why have they dwindled down from dreadnaughts to common battleships within the last 12 months? What has caused it except the necessity to minimize and make look small our dreadnaught list in order to induce Congressmen to vote for more dreadnaughts? If there is any other explanation for it I would like to hear what it is.

Now, let me call your attention to some of the facts about these four German dreadnaughts, the Westfalen, the Nassau, the Posen, and the Rhineland. In the first place, those ships are armed with 11-inch guns, and if they are dreadnaughts then they are the only dreadnaughts in the world that have their guns smaller than the 12-inch guns. I defy anybody to produce a foreign authority of any navy in the world to show any other dreadnaughts that have 11-inch guns except these four that they have crowded into the German dreadnaught list in order to make it look bigger than ours.

Now, I want to read to you a description of those four vessels from Janes's "Fighting Ships of the World," on page 907. He gives the Westfalen, the Nassau, the Posen, and the Rhineland, and after giving you a complete description of the ships he makes this note:

Ammunition supply to 6-inch gun unsatisfactory.

That is one thing about it. They have not room enough there to place the ammunition so that in case of battle the men can easily get it. That is one defect. Now, he says further:

As originally designed the Nassau was to have carried eight big guns. These ships steam well, but they draw more than the designed draft by at least a foot. They are very cramped internally, and it is difficult to accommodate the crews. They are only moderately successful, being overgunned for their displacement.

The truth is that these four pretended dreadnaughts with their 11-inch guns are designed as battleships, and only intended to have eight 11-inch guns, but when these dreadnaughts in America and the English dreadnaughts were built, they decided to change them, and instead of eight guns, according to the original plan, they now have twelve 11-inch guns on them, which is more than the ships were planned to receive. The consequence is that it gives them a draft of at least a foot, according to that authority, and maybe more, that they draw over the draft for which they were designed. In fact, they are loaded down with too many guns and turrets, and it makes them unsatisfactory ships, and in order to make room for so many more guns than were intended the whole thing is cramped; they have not room enough for their powder, and they have not room enough for their men to turn around in, and yet they are crowded into the dreadnaught class in order to make it look big. That is the fact about those ships. It has been suggested that you can put a heavy load on the Oregon and thereby sink its armored belt so deep in the water as to deprive it of armor protection, but these four so-called German dreadnaughts are so weighted down with too many guns and turrets that it is not necessary to put a big load on them to sink their belts into the water.

Now, if you were to remove the South Carolina and the Michigan from the battleship list into the dreadnaught list and move these four pretended dreadnaughts of the Germans from the dreadnaught list to the battleship list, it would result this way: That Germany instead of having 20 battleships would have 24, and we would have 25; and Germany would have 9 dreadnaughts and we would have 9.

That is the way the thing would result, and it is just a question of juggling figures. You divide a thing into two classes and crowd into one list ships that do not belong there and take from the other list ships that ought to be there, and then you get up and say that the way to compare these navies is to compare the capital ships. And that is the way they make our Navy inferior to the German Navy.

Now, I want to call your attention to another thing. The third class is the cruisers. Germany has 16 armored cruisers. They say that we have only 11. I want to call your attention to what they do say about that in the Navy Yearbook of 1913. On page 833 you will find, down at the bottom, "armored cruisers," giving the list of our ships and the grand total 11 armored cruisers. Then, over on the other side you have the German cruisers. At the bottom of it, "Grand total, 16 armored cruisers," as if Germany had 5 more than we had. Down at the bottom of the page you find this note:

The Charleston, Milwaukee, and St. Louis, three armored cruisers of 9,700 tonnage, are left out of this grand total of 11.

They say with reference to these ships:

Officially these ships are protected cruisers. They are actually armored cruisers, and so treated by all standard publications. If included in above table, they would give a grand total of 14 armored cruisers.

Now there are three armored cruisers left out, not because they were not launched in time, not because they are not actually of the class that is listed there, but according to the declaration of that book on its face, they were left out because they are actually one thing and officially another.

Now, why should a thing be actually one thing and then officially another? Why should the Navy Department want to take some of our ships and degrade them from what they actually are down to something that they are not? How can you explain that upon any other principle than upon the same principle by which you are forced to explain why it was that they left out three of our battleships, why was it that they took two of our dreadnaughts out of the list, and why was it they crowded four German battleships into their dreadnaught list? Why is this, except for the studied purpose to minimize and depreciate and belittle the American Navy?

But when we add the three armored cruisers, the Charleston, Milwaukee, and St. Louis, which the yearbook admits are actually armored cruisers, and each of which exceeds in tonnage any one of five armored cruisers counted in the German list, exceeding one of them 953 tons, exceeding two of them 756 tons, and exceeding the other two 347 tons, it increases the grand total of our armored cruisers from 11, as stated in the yearbook, to 14. But this is not all. Even this list of 14 does not include the Saratoga, which was formerly called the New York, and which won so much fame at the Battle of Santiago. The Saratoga is the smallest of our armored cruisers, but the weight of the metal in a broadside from its guns and the muzzle energy of a broadside are both greater than that of the smallest German armored cruiser. When the tonnage of a German ship is greater than ours the tonnage is all important, and is the excuse for excluding the Michigan and South Carolina from the dreadnaught class, but when it was necessary to exclude four of our armored cruisers from the comparison, neither tonnage, weight of the broadside, nor muzzle energy weighs a feather in the estimation of these naval spendthrifts.

But after that, after making the list of our ships as small as possible, if you will look at this Navy Yearbook, on page 838, you will find where they attempt to compare the big guns of the two navies. They give the German guns and they give the American guns side by side in order to show that the Germans' are superior to ours. I want to call your attention to that. This list gives Germany one hundred and seventy-four 12-inch guns and sixteen 15-inch guns. She has no 13-inch guns. She has no 14-inch guns. But she has one hundred and seventy-four 12-inch guns and sixteen 15-inch guns. Then follows the American list. It gives us one hundred and forty-eight 12-inch guns, twenty 13-inch guns, and fifty-four 14-inch guns.

Now, every American gun there is reduced below the actual number. It says that we have fifty-four 14-inch guns, while anybody that knows anything about the Navy knows, as the testimony in the hearings shows, that we have sixty-four 14-inch guns.

We have the New York, the Texas, the Oklahoma, and the Nevada, four great dreadnaughts, with ten 14-inch guns each, which make 40; and then we have the Pennsylvania and No. 39, each having twelve 14-inch guns, making 24. Adding those to the 40 makes sixty-four 14-inch guns. Yet this comparative table knocks off 10 of them. What did they want to knock off 10 of them for? What is the purpose of that? You can not say that they were not launched. That is not the reason for knocking them off. They are just constructing these ships now. The ships, except two of them, have not been launched at all. Why, then, do they leave off these ten 14-inch guns. Is it possible that actually we have 64, but officially we have only 54?

Not only that, but take the 13-inch guns. They have put down twenty 13-inch guns. They knock off 12 of our 13-inch guns. We have 8 battleships, each armed with four 13-inch guns, which makes thirty-two 13-inch guns, and anybody who will take the list of our battleships and count them can see that we have 32. And yet in this table, made up to enable people to compare our Navy with the German Navy, 12 of them are knocked off, and we are credited with only 20. Now, another thing about that: If you say the 13-inch gun is not of any account, if that is the explanation of it, why did they not knock off the whole 32? All 32 of them are just identically alike. They have the same caliber, the same length, they carry the same charge of powder. They have the same muzzle energy. They have the same destructive force. Now, why should they knock off 12 of them and leave the other 20? What explanation can you give of that except the disposition to minimize the American Navy in order to induce Congressmen to vote for more battleships?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Oslerize them.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes. Now, take the other one hundred and forty-eight 12-inch guns. We have 158. These one hundred and forty-eight 12-inch guns are the number of 12-inch guns that you will find on our battleships and dreadnaughts. But we have ten 12-inch guns on the monitors, and one of those 12-inch guns on the monitors was the one that was used when they made that test that I told you about, the test that showed that those guns, according to Admiral Strauss, would have put a dreadnaught out of action in a few minutes if it had been in the place of the target. Those 10 are the kind of 12-inch guns that are left out in this comparative table.

Of course mistakes occur. One mistake might be explainable; but I ask Members of Congress to consider all the facts together. Why are three battleships left out? Why are two dreadnaughts taken out of the list and put where they do not belong? Why are four German battleships crowded into the German list of dreadnaughts? Why are four armored cruisers left out? Why are ten 14-inch guns, twelve 13-inch guns, and ten 12-inch guns left out? Could all of those things happen by mistake? Or do you believe that it is just intended to furnish to this Congress and the American people evidence of the inefficiency and smallness of our Navy, in order to induce you to vote for more battleships?

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. By what authority is this Naval Yearbook printed? The gentleman has referred to the Navy Department. Is this yearbook printed by the Navy Department?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I am glad to say that the Navy Department disowns the book. They are ashamed of it.

Mr. RAKER. You did not have the author of this book before you, did you?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No, sir. I do not know who publishes it.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to state that this book that the gentleman has been reading and commenting upon is published by the clerk of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs and is not published by the Navy Department.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I am glad to say that the Navy Department is ashamed of it.

Mr. RAKER. When the officers of the Navy were before you, did they explain the discrepancy?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I am coming to that right now, and I am glad you asked me that question.

Mr. CALLAWAY. The gentleman says the Navy Department disowns that book. I want to ask if it is not a fact that the big Navy men point to that book as the reason for making an argument that we have a small Navy, and that we ought to have a larger one?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; and if you will take the report of the majority of the Naval Affairs Committee, the report brought in by the 17 members of the Naval Affairs Committee, you will find about 40 pages in that report that are copied literally from that same Navy Yearbook that the Navy Department disowns. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Are we to understand that the chairman who presented the report was a party to that, knowing that the book was not to be depended upon?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Oh, I do not think I can say that.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman has called attention to the book as not being trustworthy, and about 40 pages of the report is based upon that.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to state to the gentleman that it is nothing of the kind; and if the gentleman will permit me, it is based upon an official report from the Navy Department, which I have here. It is copied from that.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I decline to yield, because I have not time to discuss that thing. It is one of the old things that has been issued; I have studied it, and it does not show that any navy on earth has a single gun. It just shows tons and speed and things like that. I have not time to waste in such foolishness as that. Now, the gentleman from California asked me how they explain that.

Mr. RAKER. That is important, and I think we ought to know.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. When Admiral Vreeland was before the Naval Affairs Committee, sent there by the general board, I asked him these questions, and he gave these answers, about this very table where all the guns were left out. And if you will listen to this statement, you will see what the representative of the general board, Admiral Vreeland, states—that even if you knock out, as the Navy book has done, ten 14-inch guns, twelve 13-inch guns, and ten 12-inch guns, knock all these guns out, and still, according to his statement, which I will read to you, our Navy is superior to that of Germany. [Applause.]

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Assuming that this Navy Yearbook is correct—

That was a violent assumption that I made—

Assuming that this Navy Yearbook is correct in its statement that Germany is now building ships on which they will have sixteen 15-inch guns, that we are building ships on which we will have fifty-four 14-inch guns, that Germany has none, that we have twenty 13-inch guns and Germany has none, would you say that that statement, if true, would show that the German Navy is superior to ours?

Admiral VREELAND. That statement by itself would mean that our Navy is superior.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Admiral Twining stated before this committee last year that a 14-inch gun has a destructive power 50 per cent greater than a 12-inch gun and that it shoots with 30 per cent more accuracy. Do you agree in that statement?

Admiral VREELAND. I should say, coming from the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, that it was correct.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. You have never gone into that?

Admiral VREELAND. It would require a table of ballistics.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Do you think the statement of Admiral Twining in that regard was probably correct?

Admiral VREELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. You agree with him, so far as you know, without examining the tables and refreshing your memory?

Admiral VREELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. You said that, assuming that the showing in this yearbook as to the number of 13, 14, and 15 inch guns is correct, it would show that our Navy is superior. Assuming, then, also, that in the German Navy they have one hundred and seventy-four 12-inch guns and we have 148, giving them 26 more than we have, and considering our superiority in 13 and 14 inch guns, and considering the probable accuracy of the statement of Admiral Twining that a 14-inch gun shoots with 50 per cent more destructive force and 30 per cent more accuracy than a 12-inch gun, what would you say as to the relative strength of the two navies, assuming all that to be true?

Admiral VREELAND. I would say that the German Navy is more powerful than ours.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Would you think that their superiority in the number of twenty-six 12-inch guns would overcome our superiority in 13 and 14 inch guns?

Admiral VREELAND. We have not any 13-inch guns, except on ships that are obsolete. Using only your figures, I would say that the argument was on your side.

There I took the comparative statement as to the big guns taken from the Navy Yearbook, leaving out the ten 14-inch guns and the other guns that I have referred to, and put up to him the comparison between these big guns, and he says that our Navy is superior and that the argument is on my side. If I had then put the question to him, which I was not so unkind as to do, what he would think if you would add to our list all the big guns that were left out, why, there is no doubt but that he would have said our Navy was twice as powerful as the Germany Navy.

Now, having determined what we have in our Navy, having determined that we have 39 battleships and 15 cruisers, and Germany has 39 battleships and 16 cruisers, I want to give you a comparison of these navies. I have a table showing it accurately. I am not going to detain you by reading all the figures in the tables, but I will content myself with giving you the totals. However, I have here the size and caliber of every gun in both navies, with the weight of the shells from each gun and the muzzle energy of each gun, and I will put all of those tables into my remarks when I extend them, so that any Member of the House who desires to verify can get the tables and do it. But I will not detain you by going into details.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Do your tables give any information as to the character of shells used in the German Navy, whether they are armor-piercing shells or not?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. They are all armor-piercing shells as far as I know.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Has the gentleman any definite information upon that?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Very little. The committee has never gone into that. We do not know much about that; but I understand from the books that all these are armor-piercing shells.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Armor-piercing shells depend entirely, or almost entirely, for their destructive power upon penetration and explosion after penetration, do they not?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I will not have time to yield to my friend to make a speech.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But my inquiry is not a speech. It is a question.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I thought the gentleman was making a statement. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. My question was whether the armor-piercing shell does not depend largely, if not entirely, for its destructive power upon penetration and explosion after penetration?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; it does entirely.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. To what distance will it penetrate before exploding?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. That depends altogether upon the shell and the gun. Some of them will penetrate a great deal farther than others. Big guns will have a longer range than smaller ones.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I mean the largest ones.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. My recollection is that the table shows that the 14-inch gun has a penetration of 14 inches at 12,000 yards.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Take the Battle of Santiago. The Oregon, as well as some others of our ships, poured shot after shot into the Spanish ships and did not sink one. How was that?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Simply because they did not hit them in the right place.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Oh, yes; they hit them nearly everywhere. Then the Spaniards ran the ships aground.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. There were no ships sunk in the Spanish-American War or in the Japanese War——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois (interrupting). Oh, yes.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Excuse me.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I can not yield any further. I was going to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Has the gentleman read Capt. Semenoff's history of the Battle of the Yellow Sea?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I can not yield any more. I have not the time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am sorry the gentleman's information is not more accurate.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, we have in the predreadnaught fleet of America 492 guns—thirty-two 13-inch guns, seventy-eight 12-inch guns, one hundred and forty-four 8-inch guns, eighty-eight 7-inch guns, and one hundred and fifty 6-inch guns. That makes a total of 492, and the total weight of a broadside from all of those guns is 171,730 pounds. The Germans have a total of 380 guns, 112 guns less than we have, and a broadside from those guns weighs 80,920 pounds. In other words, it weighs 90,810 pounds less than a broadside from the American battleships, or the American broadside is 11,000 pounds more than twice as great as the German broadside. I refer now to the battleship fleet.

American predreadnaught fleet, weight of metal in broadside.

		Pounds.
32	13-inch projectiles, 1,130 pounds	36,160
78	12-inch projectiles, 870 pounds	67,860
144	8-inch projectiles, 260 pounds	37,440
88	7-inch projectiles, 165 pounds	14,520
150	6-inch projectiles, 105 pounds	15,750
492	guns, total weight of metal	171,730

German predreadnaught fleet, weight of metal in broadside.

		Pounds.
40	9.4-inch projectiles, 419 pounds	16,760
160	5.9-inch projectiles, 101 pounds	16,160
40	11-inch projectiles, 661 pounds	26,440
140	6.7-inch projectiles, 154 pounds	21,560
380	guns, total weight of metal	80,920

171,730—80,920=90,810 excess of American over German.

Compare those two parts of the fleets as to muzzle energy. The same guns give a muzzle energy to the American fleet of 7,762,842 foot-tons, while the Germans have a muzzle energy of 4,202,300 foot-tons. In other words, we exceed them in muzzle energy by 3,558,542 foot-tons, or nearly twice as much as theirs. Of course, that depends on what you put in the battleship class and the dreadnaught class. If you take these four German battleships which I have discussed out of the dreadnaught class and put them back where they belong in the battleship class, then it would give the muzzle energy of the German battleships at 6,101,740 foot-tons, or, in other words, leave us ahead of them only 1,666,102 foot-tons. When you take so many of the German ships out of the first class and put them in the second it makes ours over twice as great as theirs, but when you arrange them as they should be, it still gives us a large superiority over the German fleet. The following table gives the number of each type of guns and the muzzle energy of each gun, and the total muzzle energy of all the guns on the 20 German battleships and on the 25 American battleships, as follows:

American predreadnaught guns—muzzle energy.

		Foot-tons.
32	13-inch 35-caliber, muzzle energy 40,388	1,292,416
6	12-inch 35-caliber, muzzle energy 26,596	159,576
40	12-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 40,768	1,630,720
32	12-inch 35-caliber, muzzle energy 48,948	1,566,336
40	8-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 7,948	317,920
104	8-inch 45 caliber, muzzle energy 13,360	1,389,440
88	7-inch 45-caliber, muzzle energy 8,338	733,744
42	6-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 3,365	141,330
108	6-inch 50-caliber, muzzle energy 4,920	531,360
492	guns, total muzzle energy	7,762,842

German predreadnaught guns—muzzle energy.

		Foot-tons.
140	6.7-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 8,275	1,158,500
160	5.9-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 5,335	853,600
20	9.4-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 16,835	337,100
20	9.4-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 22,215	444,300
40	11-inch 40-caliber, muzzle energy 35,270	1,410,800
380	guns, total muzzle energy	4,204,300

7,762,842—4,204,300=3,558,542 in favor of United States.

If we should here rejuggle the figures and place the Westfalen, Nassau, Posen, and Rheinland back in the battleship class by adding their muzzle energy to that of the other 20 German battleships, then they would have a total muzzle energy of 6,101,740 foot-tons, or only 1,661,102 foot-tons less than the 25 American battleships, but this would lessen the muzzle energy of the German dreadnaught fleet 1,897,440 foot-tons, and therefore displease those who want more dreadnaughts. They prefer to make the American predreadnaught fleet appear to be twice as great as that of the Germans, in order to make our dreadnaught list look as small as possible.

Having compared those parts of the two fleets consisting of battleships and shown that the American fleet of battleships is about twice as powerful as the Germans, let us now compare the dreadnaughts of the two navies in respect to the weight of the metal in their broadsides and in respect to their muzzle energy. The weight of the metal in their broadsides is shown in the following table:

Weight of metal in broadside American dreadnaught guns.

		Pounds.
80	12-inch guns—shells, 870 pounds	69,600
64	14-inch guns—shells, 1,400 pounds	89,600
144		159,200

German.

		Pounds.
48	11-inch guns—shells, 661 pounds	31,728
138	12-inch guns—shells, 860 pounds	118,680
16	15-inch guns—shells, 1,676 pounds	26,816
202		177,224

177,224 pounds minus 159,200 pounds equal 18,024 pounds in favor of the German.

The muzzle energy of American dreadnaughts.

		Foot-tons.
24	12-inch guns—muzzle energy, 52,483	1,259,592
56	12-inch guns—muzzle energy, 48,948	2,741,088
64	14-inch guns—muzzle energy, 65,606	4,198,784
144	Total	8,199,464

The muzzle energy of German dreadnaughts.

		Foot-tons.
48	11-inch guns—muzzle energy, 39,530	1,897,440
138	12-inch guns—muzzle energy, 45,500	5,979,000
16	15-inch guns—muzzle energy, 90,350	1,445,600
202	Total	9,322,040

9,322,040 foot-tons minus 8,199,464 foot-tons equal 1,289,136 foot-tons in favor of the German dreadnaughts.

I am counting among the dreadnaughts these four ships armed with 11-inch guns, and I have this result, that we have a broadside from our dreadnaught fleet of 159,200 pounds and from the German fleet 177,224 pounds; in other words, they have a superiority over us of about 17,000 pounds. Counting those four ships that I claim ought to be in the battleship class as dreadnaughts, if you put them where they ought to be, then the broadside from the German dreadnaught fleet would be about 15,000 or 16,000 pounds less than ours. Of course you can make either one or the other the greater by juggling the figures. It is an easy matter to make either our dreadnaughts or theirs superior, according to the way you arrange the ships.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think, speaking of the German dreadnaughts, that the battle cruisers ought to be counted as dreadnaughts?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. No; because the battleship crowd have divided the Navy into three classes—battleships, dreadnaughts, and cruisers—and I am discussing it in the very way that the battleship crowd has arranged it. Now, the gentleman wants to mix them up. I noticed my distinguished friend from Michigan the other day, in making his speech, when he compared the American Navy with the German Navy took 19 of their dreadnaughts and then the gentleman took 7 of their cruisers and added them together, making 26, and then he compared all of those taken from the two classes with our dreadnaughts. Now, I tried to illustrate the other day that it was not fair when you are going to compare a horse with a donkey just to take the ears of the animals [laughter], but my friend from Michigan has done worse than that. He has gotten up two donkeys and taken the ears of both of them and compared them with the American dreadnaughts. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Well, Mr. Chairman, have we any ships in our Navy that are comparable with those seven battle cruisers which I classed as dreadnaught cruisers?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; we have many ships in our Navy that would destroy them in a short time. They are not made to fight; they are made to run; their speed is about 30 knots an hour.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. With all big guns?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Their armor is thin. Why, they have no more big guns than our ships have.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They have all big guns.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Suppose they have; they are very few. Why, they have not as many big guns——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Ten or twelve big guns on a ship.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. On a ship. On the American predreadnaught class does the gentleman know how many big guns we have? Tell the House, if the gentleman knows.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not know exactly how many.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, I know exactly how many. We have one hundred and ten 12 and 13 inch guns on our battleship fleet. How many have they on the battle cruisers—tell the House.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The point I wanted to make to the gentleman from Mississippi is that in discussing these ships he ought at least to call the attention of the House to the fact that these seven battle cruisers are a different class from the ordinary armored cruisers in our Navy.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Well, I have not gotten to the cruisers; I am discussing dreadnaughts. I will come to them and I will discuss them in due time, but I do not like to mix things up. I can not discuss everything at one time. Now, in this dreadnaught comparison I want to call attention to the muzzle energy of the American dreadnaught and the German dreadnaught.

The table shows that we have 144 guns on our dreadnaughts, with a muzzle energy of 8,199,464 foot-tons, and that the Germans have 9,322,044 foot-tons. That gives the Germans an excess in the muzzle energy of their dreadnaughts of 1,122,576, counting in those four ships that I say really are battleships. Now, if you take them out it makes the muzzle energy of our dreadnaughts exceed the muzzle energy of the German dreadnaughts 774,864 tons. That is the comparison. I submit to this House that it is not a fair comparison to divide fleets up into parts and then compare the parts. You can not tell anything about that, and I was struck when I examined the British Naval Annual to see that that great authority—and it is regarded as the highest of all the naval authorities, I think, by naval officers—does not classify them like we do, but it puts down all the battleships and dreadnaughts and armored cruisers and battle cruisers in one long alphabetical list, so that you can see how many there are altogether. That is the way they compare it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose that what the gentleman says is all true, that our Navy is in these respects superior to that of Germany; just conceding for the sake of argument that that is true, what does that prove, and how does that militate against this bill?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. You are trying to get me into something I have not reached.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What are you talking about, then?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I am comparing these two navies now. I have compared the predreadnaught fleet and the dreadnaught fleet separately. Now I want to present the comparison to you, combining the two, and that shows that a broadside from our 39 battleships, including them all, is 330,700 pounds, and a broadside from the German 39 battleships is 257,000 pounds, giving us an excess of 73,730 pounds in the weight of a broadside from our entire 39 battleships over those of Germany. That is what the figures show.

Now, you take and compare the two in muzzle energy. The total muzzle energy of our 39 battleships is 15,962,306 foot-tons. The total muzzle energy of the German 39 battleships is 13,526,340 foot-tons, and giving us an excess in muzzle energy between our 39 battleships and their 39 battleships of 2,435,966 foot-tons.

Now, having compared all the battleships, I come to the armored cruiser, which is the next in order, and you will find that a broadside from the 15 American armored cruisers weighs 38,790 pounds, and from the German cruisers, including battle cruisers and all, it is 66,536, or an excess of 27,746 pounds over ours. The cruiser fleet of Germany is superior to ours. It is larger. It has more guns and has more muzzle energy and the broadside has more pounds in it. But if you were just going to compare these cruisers alone and determine it on that, if you think that the strength of a fleet consists in armored cruisers, then you ought not to pass this bill. You ought to strike these battleships out and tell your committee to go and bring in a bill here with cruisers in it. But all of our naval officers tell us that the armored cruiser and the battle cruiser is not the fighting ship that the battleship is, and for that reason they do not build them. We did build armored cruisers for a good many years. We spent $66,000,000 on them, but our experts decided they were not a good investment, and we have ceased to build them. Now, since we have ceased to build them and Germany continues to build them, the proposition is to compare the two fleets by showing that Germany has a larger armored-cruiser fleet than we have.

Now, taking the muzzle energy of our armored cruisers, it amounts to 2,203,630 foot-tons. Taking the German, it amounts to 4,185,480 foot-tons. But I submit to you that the fair thing to do is to compare the entire fleets, and I ask your attention now while I give you the figures showing the muzzle energy of all the American armored ships and all the German ships. Our American predreadnaughts, dreadnaughts, and cruisers have a total muzzle energy of 18,155,930 foot-tons; that of the Germans, including my friend's battle cruisers, is 17,711,820 foot-tons. In other words, the American exceeds that of the German in muzzle energy by 444,110 foot-tons. Now, you take the broadsides and compare the entire fleet in that respect. The American battleships, dreadnaughts, and cruisers have a broadside with a weight of 369,490 pounds; the Germans, 325,536 pounds, or the total weight of the metal in a broadside of our fleet exceeds the total weight of the metal in a broadside of the German fleet by 45,954 pounds. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14034, the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter signed by the Clerk of the House in reference to a correction in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter about a correction of the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1914.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: On March 21, 1914, the following brief appeared by mistake in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under the head of petitions: "By Mr. DYER: Petitions of 25,533 citizens of St. Louis, Mo., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary."

It was discovered the next day that this petition did not come from St. Louis, and that it was not filed by Mr. DYER. Proper corrections were made and said brief does not appear in the permanent RECORD of the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the privileged question that was discussed this morning by inserting a few letters and telegrams.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the privileged question discussed this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what are these things about? This rate proposition?

Mr. LEVY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

CAPT. WILLIAM O. KEAS.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak of a young man from my district who was wounded yesterday in battle at Vera Cruz, Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, among the marines landed yesterday at Vera Cruz, Mexico, was Capt. William O. Keas, chief turret captain on the battleship South Carolina. He was a resident of Hillsdale, in the third congressional district of Michigan, which I have the honor to now represent. Capt. Keas served on the South Carolina. He was the first, or one of the first three, from the State of Michigan to shed blood in the present war with Mexico. He is of most exemplary character. He belongs to one of the first families of Hillsdale. His father is the present sheriff of his county. He is a distinguished officer—brave, fearless, and patriotic. He was wounded under the flag.

Whatever the result of that war may be, I am sure that the people and the citizens of the State of Michigan will do their full share to support the dignity and add luster to the banner of our country; and in the end we shall receive not only the plaudits of the world, but we shall take such advanced position, and our course will be so beneficial to civilization, that this war will go down in history as one of the most humane and beneficent that was ever waged on the American Continent. Let us all hope for his speedy recovery, and that his young life may be extended to many years of usefulness and honor in his own beloved land. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, on what subject does the gentleman propose to extend his remarks?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. In regard to one of the sailors that was killed at Vera Cruz.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3403) to abolish the office of receiver of public moneys at Springfield, Mo., and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the following joint resolution:

House joint resolution 253.

Resolved, etc., That the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for the naval station, New Orleans, La., and not yet turned back into the Treasury, are hereby reappropriated and made available for expenditure at that station for such purpose as the Secretary of the Navy may direct.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15906. An act providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico;

H. R. 13453. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; and

H. R. 7138. An act to provide for raising the Volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 656. An act granting to the trustees of the diocese of Montana of the Protestant Episcopal Church, for the benefit of "Christ Church on the Hill," at Poplar, Mont., lots 5, 6, and 7 in block 30, town site of Poplar, State of Montana.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 13453. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; and

H. R. 15906. An act providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico.

NAVAL STATION, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House joint resolution 253, which was passed this morning, with a Senate amendment, amending the title, and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will not bring that up to-night. There are only 25 Members here at the present time.

Mr. PADGETT. It is only to amend the title. The resolution was passed in the House this morning by unanimous consent, and in the Senate by unanimous consent. It is a measure incident to this Mexican trouble, and it is only amending the title.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is only a technical correction?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, what is the amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. It amends the title to the resolution that was passed this morning.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Putting a title to it?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment. What is the purpose of this resolution?

Mr. PADGETT. The resolution is to make available certain funds of unobligated balances of appropriations that had heretofore been made for the naval station at New Orleans, making them available for purposes incident to this present trouble. It passed this morning by unanimous consent, and it has passed the Senate; and this is to amend the title.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the gentleman let it go over for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. PADGETT. It has already passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the gentleman withhold it now and take it up in the morning.

Mr. PADGETT. The department was anxious to get it through.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no doubt about the attitude of the department, Mr. Speaker. This, however, is a deficiency appropriation. The present situation is not one in which we should be slipshod in our methods of appropriating the public money. There are some things of importance which should be attended to and looked after here regardless of the wish of the department. So far as I am concerned, I propose that the House shall not relax its vigilance in the control of the public money. Whatever is needed in reference to the present emergency I am sure will be granted. It will not hurt to let this resolution wait until to-morrow.

Mr. PADGETT. It has already passed the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not have passed the House if I had been present. I was engaged in committee on other business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PADGETT. Very well. I will withhold it until to-morrow morning. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] withdraws his request, and moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 25, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 25, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in whom we live, move, and have our being, we desire to come into Thy presence, even into the inner sanctuary where Thy Honor dwelleth, that we may behold Thy glory. Our eyes have been too much fixed upon the glory that fadeth away. We desire to come to the changeless order, to understand that above us, and not in conflict with any human interest, is the exceeding glory of our God. With Thee there is justice and judgment. Mercy and peace are mingled together before Thy throne. Grace and truth abide in fullness before Thee. So do Thou enable us to enter into Thy presence, abide under Thy protection, follow Thy guidance, and do that which is pleasing in Thy sight. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. Brandegee and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. STATEMENT BY SENATOR CULBERSON ON PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have here a statement given out recently by my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], on the Panama tolls question. He gave it out at Mineral Wells, Tex., about a week ago. I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that an article prepared by his colleague relating to the so-called tolls question may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an article prepared by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and the Chair does not understand that it falls within the rule laid down. The Chair will put the question to the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that the statement was given out by my colleague at Mineral Wells, Tex., a few days ago. It is a judicial discussion of the question, and I do not think it will be subject to any objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not understand that it was a statement prepared by a Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to its being printed in the RECORD, of course.

The statement referred to is as follows:

CULBERSON OPPOSES FREE-TOLLS SUBSIDY—SENATOR FROM TEXAS SUPPORTS PRESIDENT WILSON'S REPEAL POLICY—IN VIOLATION OF TREATY—ALTHOUGH OPPOSING HAY-PAUNCEFOTE PACT, BELIEF IS EXPRESSED THAT IT SHOULD BE ADHERED TO.

MINERAL WELLS, TEX., April 17.

In answer to repeated inquiries as to his views on the Panama Canal toll question, now pending in Congress, Senator CHARLES A. CULBERSON to-day gave out the following statement:

"In 1850 a treaty was entered into between the United States and Great Britain on the subject of an isthmian canal, which is commonly known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It related in express terms to a canal across Nicaragua, and to my mind it is doubtful if it referred to a canal at Panama constructed by the United States at their own expense. The only reference to Panama in this treaty is in article 8, where the two Governments agreed 'to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama.' This is a mere agreement to guarantee 'protection' by treaty stipulations to others who might construct a canal by way of Tehuantepec or Panama, and does not contemplate that either the United States or Great Britain would do so. On the contrary, it is stipulated in article 1 of the treaty that neither party should 'ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.'

"Among other stipulations in this treaty of 1850 were: (1) That the canal should be constructed 'for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all,' and (2) that neither party should occupy, fortify, colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America.

"I was elected to the Senate the first time in 1899.

OPPOSED HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

"In 1900 a treaty was proposed between the United States and Great Britain on the subject of an isthmian canal, which, in effect, superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and I was one of the 18 who voted against it in the Senate. This is known as the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In 1901 the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the one now in force, was proposed, and I was one of the 6 who voted against it in the Senate, the others being Senators Bacon, Blackburn, Mallory, Teller, and TILLMAN.

"My vote against these treaties was based upon the fact that Great Britain had violated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, as shown by the diplomatic notes of Secretaries of State Blaine and others, in 1881 and subsequently; that this treaty was therefore obsolete and of no effect; and that Great Britain, under the circumstances, should not and need not be consulted by the United States in the construction of the canal, particularly when it was proposed, if deemed expedient, that it should be built by the United States directly and at their own cost.

"Nevertheless, this second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was adopted by the Senate by the large vote of 72 to 6, and as it is now the law of the land the chief question which arises in this controversy is whether the act of the Congress which provides that American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States shall pass through the canal free of tolls is in conflict with the treaty.

"This brings me to the terms of the treaty itself. Unquestionably, unlike the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, this treaty applies to Panama, for it declares that it has application to 'whatever route may be considered expedient.' And it applied to the construction of the canal when done directly by the United States at their own expense, because it provides that the 'canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscriptions to or purchase of stock or shares.' By the first paragraph of article 3 it is provided that the 'canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.'

IN CONFLICT WITH TREATY.

"In my opinion, after a thorough reexamination of the subject, the act of the Congress referred to is in conflict with this provision of the treaty. Argument is unnecessary to show that Great Britain and the United States, parties to the treaty, are included in the term 'all nations,' nor that ships engaged in the coastwise trade are 'vessels of commerce.' Both the United States and Great Britain have coastwise trade on this continent and it is a plain and manifest discrimination to allow our vessels engaged in that trade to pass through the canal free of tolls, for the coastwise trade of the two countries is the same kind and class of trade. Moreover, the exemption from tolls of a class of vessels will tend to lay an unnecessary and heavier burden on ships which are taxed, which will affect the justness and equitable character of the tolls.

"The economic and secondary question which is involved is equally clear to me. The American vessels of commerce engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States now enjoy a monopoly, inasmuch as vessels of other countries are prohibited from engaging in that trade and an exemption of the payment of canal tolls would add to that monopoly. This is not only true, but such an exemption would not appreciably benefit the general public by a reduction of freight rates, because, as has been shown by experts, a large per cent of the American ships of our coastwise trade is controlled by transcontinental railroads and rates would be fixed by them on the basis of what the traffic would bear.

ABROGATES BALTIMORE PLATFORM.

"No one has a higher regard for political platforms or has attempted to uphold them more tenaciously than myself. I have a particularly high regard for the Baltimore convention which nominated President Wilson and for the platform adopted there. When, however, a platform, through lack of full consideration or because of error in judgment, adopts a plank the demand of which is in plain conflict with a treaty which national legislators are obligated to support, it ought to be disregarded. Believing that the plank in the Baltimore platform on the subject of the canal tolls is in violation of this treaty, it will not control my views, but on the contrary I favor a repeal of the act of 1912, which exempts American vessels of the coastwise trade from the payment of canal tolls.

"This treaty, it seems to me, was inconsiderately entered into, my opinion in respect to it having undergone no change, but rather has been strengthened by subsequent events, including the increased cost of the canal from the estimated sum of $184,000,000 to more than $400,000,000. As long, however, as the treaty is in force national good faith demands that it should be respected by the United States."

MANIFESTS OF VESSELS.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3886) to repeal sections 2588, 2589, and 2590 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 451) thereon.

CHESAPEAKE & DELAWARE CANAL CO.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On March 20 the Senate passed Senate resolution 304, authorizing the Committee on Coast and Insular Survey to investigate and report on the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co. Under this authorization a subcommittee have held hearings on the subject which have been printed. On behalf of the Committee on Coast and Insular Survey I submit a report (No. 452) to accompany Senate resolution 304, which I ask may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed.

CAPT. TEMPLIN MORRIS POTTS.

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 3804) for the relief of Templin Morris Potts, captain on the retired list of the United States Navy, and I submit a report (No. 453) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask leave to submit the views of the minority (Rept. No. 453, pt. 2) on the bill just reported by the Senator from West Virginia, which I ask may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views submitted by the Senator from Florida will be received and printed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 5401) granting an increase of pension to Harry D. Hogan (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 5402) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Minnick (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5403) granting a pension to Mrs. John H. Keatley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 5404) for the payment of certain sums due by reason of an injury sustained by Second Lieut. Rogers, United States Army, while attempting to provide suitable mounts for United States Army (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5405) for the relief of A. G. Compton and Messrs. Herndon and Compton (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 5406) to establish a light and fog-signal station on Michigan Island, Lake Superior; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 5407) granting a pension to Ida M. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 5408) granting an increase of pension to Franklin Parlin; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 5409) granting an increase of pension to Martha E. Enicks (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 143) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the southeast Texas fair, to be held at Beaumont, Tex., during the month of November, 1914; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for experiments and investigations of range conditions within national forests, etc., from $25,000 to $27,000, and providing that $2,000 thereof shall be used in grazing experiments in the national forest at Halsey, Nebr., intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMERENE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on April 24, 1914, approved and signed the following act:

S. 4980. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1914.

CONGRESS OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE (H. DOC. NO. 928).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, to be held at Paris from the 8th to the 10th of June, 1914, and a letter from the Department of Commerce showing the favor with which that department views the proposed gathering and recommending an appropriation of not to exceed $2,000 to defray the expenses of participation by the United States.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1914.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. STERLING submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11269) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 12, 13, 14, 20, 21, 29, 30, 38, and 41.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 4½, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 17, 19, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 42, and 43, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$40"; and the Senate agree to the same.

THOMAS STERLING,
BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
J. A. M. ADAIR,
J. N. LANGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 15692. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 15959. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. J. Res. 242. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to loan equipment for the purpose of instruction and training to sanitary organizations of the American National Red Cross was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the head of "Resolutions coming over from a preceding day," the Chair presumes that as unfinished business he should lay before the Senate the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to exclude from the RECORD the letter presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yesterday I submitted a motion to expunge from the RECORD a letter which was presented by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. I do not know when is the appropriate time to call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been laid before the Senate in regular order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire, then, to have it disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] does not appear to be in his seat.

Mr. POINDEXTER entered the Chamber.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Washington is here now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah to strike from the RECORD the article presented on yesterday.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in the first place, in regard to that, if the Chair maintains the attitude which the Chair assumed on yesterday in the ruling which he made, I do not know but that this whole matter is perfectly futile. I notice in the RECORD this morning that all the proceedings which occurred yesterday are not printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announced that the disputed document would be withheld from the RECORD until the final disposition of the motion to exclude it from the RECORD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is what I am referring to. Of course, I submit to the ruling of the Chair. At the same time, I beg leave to say that I think it was entirely an assumption on the part of the Chair, and there is not any precedent or rule by which the Chair could legitimately undertake to edit the RECORD. I think that is a matter which the Senate should determine for itself. Of course, if the Chair did that on yesterday, it could do it on to-day. So it is a matter which leads to a great deal of uncertainty whatever the Senate may do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senator inquiring of the Chair to know what he would do with the communication in the event the question is not disposed of to-day?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not making any inquiry of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs pardon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am simply expressing my view in regard to the parliamentary situation, as I understand I have a right to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly; there is no objection to that on the part of the Chair.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to know that the Chair does not object to that. I hope what I say will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. President, it seems to me this matter has been conducted on a very one-sided theory. I notice that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] on yesterday, while objecting very strenuously to language that was used by those of us who are opposed to the repeal of the law which grants exemption to American ships engaged in domestic commerce in passing through the canal, is very free himself in committing the same indiscretion which he charges us with. He says the arguments presented are cheap. Then the Senator from Georgia proceeds to argue the question on its merits and to say that the opponents of the repeal are allied with the Shipping Trust.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say anything of the kind; I beg the Senator's pardon. I illustrated what might have been said with equal force, and I expressed disapproval of any such suggestion with reference to a Senator. I never for a moment attributed any alliance on the part of the Senator from Washington with the coastwise Shipping Trust. I was expressing my disapproval of the insinuations contained in the letter offered by the Senator from Washington. I went on to say that just as fairly a suggestion of this kind might be made against the Senators who are on the other side, and if I recollect correctly I expressly disclaimed any such criticism upon them. I am sure I made no criticism upon any Senator. I pointed out the impropriety of the criticisms contained in the letter and I sought to indicate that a similar criticism might equally have been made against the Senators who are maintaining that the corporations owning coastwise vessels should pass their vessels through free.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the whole argument of the Senator from Georgia is to the effect I have just stated. He said that the coastwise shipping is controlled by a trust, and referred to Mr. ALEXANDER'S House report. Of course, if that is true and that trust is interested, as the Senator says, in this repeal, those Senators and citizens who are advocating the same thing are necessarily in alliance with them. I want to say in regard to the statement of the Senator from Georgia that his argument is cheap. If he can say that to us we can say it to him, and we are just where we started. That sort of an argument amounts to nothing; it comes right back to where we started from.

In the first place it is perfectly absurd, if I may use that word, to talk about a shipping trust with reference to the coastwise shipping going through the Panama Canal. There is not any ship going through the Panama Canal either in a trust or out of a trust.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask if the Senator has discovered and is informing us of the fact that the Panama Canal is not yet carrying commercial vessels. If so, we are very much obliged to him for the information.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am attempting to inform the Senator from Georgia of the fact that there is not any shipping trust operating ships through the canal, as one might infer from his argument. There is no line of ships or company controlling ships, so far as I am aware, which are ready to operate ships through the Panama Canal, and if there are—on one side the only line of ships that is plying to Panama is the line of ships controlled by the Government of the United States; on the other side the line of ships controlled by the Southern Pacific Railroad. I do not know, and I do not know whether the Senator from Georgia knows, but if the same construction is given to all the provisions of this treaty that the Senator gives to a portion of them, the Government itself would have to pay tolls upon its ships going through this canal. I do not know whether the Government intends to send its commercial ships through the canal and to engage in commerce between the Pacific and the Atlantic ports. I do not think anything has been indicated to that effect. I do not know whether the Southern Pacific Railroad has arranged to do so.

As to this control of the shipping engaged in the coastwise trade that the Senator refers to as controlled by a trust, where are they? What business are they engaged in? A part of it is a line of ships plying between Washington and Norfolk. Are they going through the Panama Canal? Part of it is a number of lines of ships that are engaged in commerce on the New England coast, between New England and New York, the Merchant & Miners line of ships between Norfolk and Boston, a line of ships between Boston and Fall River. That is all a part of the coastwise shipping which the Senator refers to. Are those ships going through the Panama Canal? Are they going to be taken into that trade and put into the transcontinental trade through the Panama Canal?

The Senator even referred to the shipping on the Great Lakes. Are those ships going to be taken from the Great Lakes trade and put into the Panama trade? On the Pacific coast there is a large ship line, controlled by what is commonly known as the Alaska Syndicate. That is a part of the coastwise shipping which goes to make up this trust of which the Senator speaks—ships plying between the city of Seattle and American ports in Alaska. There is not any probability that those ships are going to be taken out of that trade and put through the Panama Canal.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I notice the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] as well, in referring to this question, speak frequently of the "coastwise shipping trust." I should like either one of those Senators to indicate what this trust is, who belong to it, and what it is made up of. I contend there is no such thing as a coastwise shipping trust.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator discriminate between the Senator from Washington and myself.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I decline to yield to the Senator from Georiga to discuss the question now. I will conclude in a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is mistaken when he says I referred to it as a trust. I will later state what I did say about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will read what the Senator from Georgia said in regard to it. He said:

> Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not make a speech to-day upon the question of charging coastwise vessels for going through the Panama Canal. The letter which has been read undertakes to charge all Senators who are in favor of making the coastwise vessels which go through the canal pay tolls with seeking to foster a monopoly; it undertakes to attribute the movement largely to the activities of the railroads which are interested in the subject. That is a very unjust and a very unfair style of discussion.
> I would not for a moment suggest that the Senator from Washington was in favor of allowing the coastwise vessels to go through the Panama Canal free in the interests of the two corporations which control most of them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I said.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator further said:

> The report of the Alexander committee, of the other House, has recently shown that our coastwise vessels not owned by railroad companies are practically in the hands of two companies; that these two companies have a gentlemen's agreement eliminating competition; and that they are making more money than is made by nearly any other corporation in the country.

And yet the Senator from Georgia says this morning that he did not refer to a shipping trust.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not refer to them as a shipping trust, and the Senator has read my language and sees that I did not. I simply quoted from the Alexander report.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will leave what the Senator from Georgia said yesterday and what he says to-day to the judgment of a candid Senate and a candid country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So will I.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me that when he referred to the elimination of competition he referred to a trust. Mr. President, I do not myself think there is a shipping trust; I think the shipping on the coast is controlled by railroads, and the railroads control ships where shipping comes into competition with the railroads. I have no doubt that the railroads interested in transportation between Washington and Norfolk are largely interested in the ships that ply between Washington and Norfolk, and likewise the railroads competing with the traffic which goes between Norfolk and New York on the Old Dominion Line, and undoubtedly as to the railroads in New England; one railroad, which dominated transportation in New England until quite recently—at least until its methods were exposed and became subject to the investigation of the Interstate Commerce Commission—largely controlled the shipping of New England.

There is a local shipping trust on the northwest coast which controls shipping, with the exception of one ship, between the United States and the Territory of Alaska. There is not any community of interest between that local trust and the shipping plying on the north Atlantic coast; there would be no reason why there should be; but I want to say that, in my judgment, if there were a shipping trust, if there were any ships prepared to trade in the domestic commerce through the Panama Canal, the imposition of tolls would be in the interest of the trust and would tend to exclude independent competition, because the trust, with its advantages, with its power of discrimination, with its connection with the railroads, their terminals, and their docking facilities in the cities on both coasts, could afford to pay tolls and could take it out of the people, who ultimately must pay for it all, and use it as a means of keeping out the competition of independent ship lines.

I fail to see how the imposition of tolls could be in the interest of independent lines who are in competition in domestic commerce through the Panama Canal. I will add to that, Mr. President, to refer to tolls upon ships passing through the Panama Canal as a subsidy—which must be a new discovery; it was not discovered, apparently, by the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber at the time their platform was adopted, because they themselves have pointed out that they have in the same platform a declaration against subsidy; this discovery that it was a subsidy is a new one—speaking of it as a subsidy arises from confusing free passage on a highway of commerce with transportation. The two things are entirely different. Allowing ships to pass free through a great waterway is no more a subsidy than to allow vehicles of traffic to pass free upon a highway which is built by a city or by the Government. We have to pay no tolls to go upon those roads, but we have to pay for transportation or furnish it ourselves; and that would be the case with the Panama Canal. A free highway is a very different thing from a subsidy in aid of transportation.

Mr. President, I want to refer for a moment to this letter. The writer of it says:

> The progress of the Panama tolls controversy reveals with clearness, increasing from day to day, the following two facts—

This is the basis of the letter, and this analysis of the situation was what attracted my attention—

> First. That the reasons assigned by the repealers for the surrender of our rights in a matter of purely domestic regulation, such as the exemption of American coastwise shipping from toll payment, have been abandoned, one after the other, until the repeal is now sought on the ground that the forces behind the repeal merely want it. They have fixed their desires upon it, and their "arguments" are now only reiterated requests for what they want.

I do not suppose, Mr. President, the writer of that intended to make it include everybody who assumes that position. He was referring to those who are agitating this question, a number of them particularly, as I am informed, the representatives of certain great transcontinental railroads in New York; and I hope I may say, without offense to Senators or to any Senator, that the transcontinental railroads are interested in putting any obstacle and any obstruction that they possibly can upon shipping through the Panama Canal, in order to lessen its effect as a competitive transportation route across the country. I do not think that can be successfully denied. What is involved here is not only the tolls which will have to be paid by those interested in transportation through the canal but it is a thousandfold of those tolls which will be added to the railroad rates on the freight that is hauled across the country by rail, because those rates will be based as the fundamental factor upon the competitive rates of the Panama Canal. The writer proceeds:

> Second. That the interests of monopoly, or of subsidy, or of special privilege—call it what you like—are fighting on the side of repeal.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the declaration the Senator makes in reference to transportation across the country would only apply to the seaboard, would it not, on either side, the Pacific and the Atlantic? It would not apply to the interior, would it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would; and I will explain to the Senator the basis——

Mr. WEST. How could it apply to Denver, for instance?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, it would apply to Denver to a certain extent, because the rates to Denver, as the Senator is informed, are affected by the terminal rates to San Francisco. That is one of the great railroad questions which have been agitated in this country for the last 20 years.

Mr. WEST. Would it not have the effect, if exemption from tolls were granted through the canal, to lower the rates to the terminals and correspondingly increase them to points in the interior?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I fail to see how the Senator can make that deduction. The rates to many interior points where they are not affected by water competition are fixed upon the basis of the rates to the terminals. That is the case in most of what is called the intermountain country, in the rates which have been in litigation in the Federal courts and in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and litigation pending for two years in the Supreme Court of the United States involves that identical question.

But the reason of my answer to the Senator from Georgia, more generally speaking, is this, that the greater part of the country outside of the ocean ports base freight rates, which are determined more or less by water competition, upon our great waterways; and every city, every community, every family that lives on or in the vicinity of the Ohio River, the Mississippi River, and the Missouri River, and whose conditions of existence are influenced by the rates of transportation that they have to pay and whose rates of transportation are based upon water competition, either actual or potential, are interested in the free passage of domestic commerce through the Panama Canal; for ships coming through the Panama Canal, and shipping coming through it, can reach the cities and the hamlets on these great rivers just as they reach our improved harbors on the coast. The transcontinental rates through a great area of country have, as one of their great divisional factors, what are called the rates to Missouri River points; and the rates to Missouri River points are fixed through the effect very largely of water transportation upon the Missouri River.

I heard here in a discussion of the river and harbor bill not long ago from the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] some remarks about the efforts of Kansas City to secure a reduction of railroad freight rates by putting steamboats on the Missouri River; and he deprecated the effect of it and the advantage of it to Kansas City, strange to say, because he said that that city had not reaped the comparative advantage that it expected, in view of the fact that when the rates to Kansas City had gone down the railroads likewise reduced the rates to Chicago. I think, instead of being an argument against the effect of water transportation, that is an argument in favor of it; instead of being limited to Kansas City alone, by indirect action it reached out as far as Chicago.

The same thing will be true in every community whose rates are reduced by water competition through the great rivalry of trade and the demands upon railroads to give, more or less and sooner or later, to one community the advantages which another community enjoys. There is not any question of subsidy involved in this tolls question.

Proceeding further, this writer says:

> The statement with which the President introduced the question to the consideration of Congress, that the exemption of our coastwise shipping from toll payment is "in plain contravention" of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, is heard no more. Senator LODGE put a quietus upon this contention.

That may be too high a compliment to the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not fully agree with the statement there, but I think that one of the most potent factors in assuring and reassuring the American people that there was no question of their honor and their contractual obligations which stood in the way of dealing with this great domestic economic question according to such policies as they deemed wise was the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not think he quieted everybody, but he quieted a great many, especially in view of his intimate connection with the making and the final ratification of that treaty. The writer further says:

> He was a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate which reported the amendments of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty and was in charge of the treaty in the Senate when it was ratified. He was in London when the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was being negotiated, and was familiar with the discussions which then took place. Later it devolved upon him to report the second treaty to the Senate and to participate in the discussions which ended in its ratification.
> "I took the view then," says Senator LODGE, "that under the terms of the treaty of November 18, 1901, the United States was at liberty to exempt its own vessels of commerce from the payment of tolls if they saw fit to do so." This is Senator LODGE'S unaltered conviction to-day.

I understand that that last statement is correct. I do not understand that the Senator from Massachusetts has changed in any respect his opinion as to this treaty. It is true, as was pointed out by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] on yesterday, that the Senator from Massachusetts found reasons to support the proposed repeal, but they were other reasons. They were not based upon any treaty obligation.

I wish to say in that connection, in passing, that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on yesterday voiced the view of a great many people, both in Congress and out of Congress, which seems to me deserving of some mention. He called attention to the fact that when this question was in the Senate before he voted in favor of this exemption, and he stated that the reason he voted in favor of it was that upon an examination of this treaty he was convinced that it did not interfere in any way with such disposition of our domestic commerce passing through the canal as we saw fit to make. He said now, however, that he was going to change his position, that he was proud to align himself with the Senator from Massachusetts; and the reason he gave for it, or at least one reason, was that upon further inquiry he found out that there was an understanding outside of the terms of the treaty, which I imagine he gathered from some letters that had been written by men who were in official position representing the two countries, which convinced him that they had a different understanding as to the effect of the treaty.

Did the Senate of the United States, when it ratified the treaty, ratify the views and the interpretation of it which were entertained by Mr. Choate or by Lord Lansdowne? My understanding is that they ratified the treaty. I do not know how many Senators had any knowledge——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am very anxious to hear the Senator discuss this question, but I can not do it on account of the disorder in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi is exactly right. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senate of the United States is supposed to be reasonably responsive to the intelligent public opinion of this country, to represent it in a measure—I think more so now than in former days. When it acted upon this treaty, in response to an intelligent public opinion, did that public opinion formulate itself and its conclusions in regard to the question whether or not the treaty should be ratified upon letters which had been exchanged or conversations which had been held between private individuals, or did it suppose it was favoring the ratification of the principles and the rules which were written in the treaty itself?

There is nothing outside of the treaty, unless it be something that is referred to in the treaty itself, that has any bearing or any effect upon our construction of it; and there is not any punctilio of honor or of fair dealing between the United States and Great Britain that requires us to give effect to any document, to any understanding, to any exchange of views not contained in the treaty itself.

There was a difference of opinion at the time among the representatives of the two countries, and I do not suppose it was ever reconciled, as to what certain phrases and words and language and paragraphs in the treaty meant and the effect they would have. There was dispute about it. I suppose the Senators who voted upon the treaty at the time had varying opinions as to what it meant. We have varying opinions as to the effect of every law which is passed. The courts vary. Upon one great question which was before the Supreme Court of the United States, involving a complete change in our economic policy, the great lawyers composing that court divided 4 to 4, 8 of them sitting upon the bench at the time, as to whether or not an income-tax law was in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

We do not decide these questions upon the views Senators may have had as to whether or not the law was in violation of the Constitution. We decide them upon the law and upon the Constitution. So, in dealing with this question, we are relegated to the bond itself.

Great Britain says there is in this treaty something which requires us to give her the same identical privileges and rights and terms in the canal that we have. I am not going to discuss the merits of that question at this time. They will be discussed, no doubt, when the question is before the Senate. Yet the representative of Great Britain, Mr. Innes, who was in charge of the British legation at the time, in July, 1912, if we are going back to the opinions of individuals, in an official note expressed the opinion that there was nothing in the treaty which prevented the United States from favoring its coastwise shipping if it was strictly limited to coastwise shipping. Whether or not it is strictly limited is a matter of administration. The law applies to coastwise shipping. The same view has been expressed by many of the British officials.

I will say further in this connection that one effect of repealing this provision will be that if American vessels passing through the canal are required to pay tolls the Canadian Pacific Railroad ships, being put upon an equal basis with our ships, and being operated more cheaply, will put us out of business through the canal unless we also repeal the provision which excludes vessels owned by our domestic railroad lines from going through the canal. The only way we can possibly put our railroads and our transcontinental shipping upon an equal basis with Canadians is by repealing that provision. They have already reserved, in express terms, the right to object to the portion of the same law which excludes railroad-owned ships; and I see a great deal more difficulty in the United States extending a law of this kind so as to regulate ships owned by foreign railroads than I do in its enforcing it as to its own coastwise shipping.

Another important effect of this repeal will be its effect upon the great lumber trade. That is an interest. I suppose the Senator will say I am speaking in behalf of that interest; and I am speaking in behalf of it, because it is an interest in which the public is concerned. If our lumber trade between our Pacific and Atlantic ports has not the advantage of free passage through the canal, the lumber trade of British Columbia, carried in Canadian ships, will occupy the New York market and all of the markets of the Atlantic coast, because the Canadians operate their ships more cheaply than we do; and they enter their lumber, too, under the existing tariff law, without the payment of any duty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. REED. What is the objection to letting into our coastwise trade the vessels of all nations?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That opens up a very broad field of inquiry and a very broad field of discussion.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator was discussing that very matter of foreign vessels carrying goods——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am speaking now, not of foreign vessels carrying goods between our own ports, but of foreign vessels from British Columbia coming into our domestic market on the Atlantic coast and taking it away from our west-coast lumber dealers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Somebody would get the benefit of that, then, would they not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I doubt very much whether they would get the benefit of it in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he favors throwing our coastwise trade open to foreign competition.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Missouri has already said that he does.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to hear him say so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to give my friend from Michigan the pleasure of hearing me say so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that it is not a pleasure to hear him make such a statement.

Mr. REED. I not only undertake to say it and will undertake to say it and undertake to defend it, but I undertake to say that of all the miserable failures that have ever resulted from an attempt to do what is in effect the subsidization of ships, the greatest is that embodied in the coastwise laws of our country. It is a well-known fact now that with the exception of certain lines of vessels that do what is practically a local business on the Lakes, the coastwise business of the United States is controlled by one great combination, and that a large part of that combination is in turn controlled by the railroads, and that this combination exacts in the way of freights the last dollar that the trade will stand.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to answer the statement of the Senator, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me. Then, to carry the Senator's statement to its logical conclusion, he would close all the American shipyards, as it is a well-known fact that in the cost of shipbuilding we can not compete with the low wages of our rivals across the seas. Not only that, but the statement the Senator has just made that he would expose our domestic shipping to unrestricted and unrestrained competition with European shipping means that he carries the doctrine of free trade as far as any of his most radical predecessors in this Chamber have ever gone, and which was wisely abandoned by Congress for the purpose of building up American shipping in our country.

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; a desire which resulted in a most miserable failure. I would not seek to protect the American shipping monopoly at the expense of the American shipping public.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; but, if the Senator will pardon me, by such a course as he advocates this morning the Senator would turn over American shipping to a foreign monopoly, with headquarters in Liverpool, over which we have no control whatever.

Mr. REED. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is the logical result of the Senator's statement.

Mr. REED. There is no foreign monopoly——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no domestic monopoly, although we do not permit foreign ships to fly the American flag or do our purely domestic shipping.

Mr. REED. But there is a domestic monopoly, because it has been protected at the demand of the most selfish interest in this country, to wit, the American shipyards. It has been granted a monopoly of the business. All that was necessary, then, was to combine. They have combined, and they continue to combine; and not 5 per cent of the seagoing ships of the United States sailing under the United States flag can go through the Panama Canal to-day under the terms of the act, because monopoly-controlled and railroad-controlled vessels are barred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield further.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me say to the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Michigan to answer the statement that has just been made. Then I shall decline to yield further.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the suggestions of my honored friend from Missouri harmonize completely with the policy of his party with reference to our domestic commerce and industry. He has made it easy, by his laws, for Americans to buy European goods. The course of the Senator and his party has stimulated the demand for European goods.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Wait a moment; I wish to finish my sentence. Your tariff laws have stimulated the demand for European goods. The ships of Europe are loaded with foreign-made goods coming this way because it has been made easier to get them in than hitherto. Having passed over to foreigners our domestic market, largely repealing restrictions hitherto in force, it is a perfectly harmonious proposition for the Senator to say that he would now turn over to Europeans America's shipping.

Mr. President, why did you put into your recent tariff law a provision discriminating in favor of American ships? Talk about subsidy! The Wilson-Underwood tariff law that you passed a little while ago discriminates in favor of goods shipped here in American bottoms.

The Senator is not exactly consistent. While you have made it easy for us to buy European-made goods, it is a natural corollary that you should now turn your shipping over to foreigners, gradually divesting the American people from their employments. I protest against it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, this is a somewhat distinct question——

Mr. REED rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield further.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will allow me just two minutes to reply to the last statement of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I scarcely see where to draw the line. I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. REED. I was directly called on the floor by the Senator from Michigan simply because I asked the Senator from Washington a question to elicit his views.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is not in accord with the facts. The cold figures show that our importations have actually fallen off since the recent tariff bill went into effect. The cold figures show that American manufacturers are now invading the markets of the world to an extent never before known in the history of the country. The cold figures show that we are promoting our shipments abroad, and that our local markets have not been captured by the manufacturers of Europe.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Washington, my colleague.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator from Missouri to state a moment ago that there was no combination in foreign shipping. I thought here would be a good place, in connection with that remark, to quote from the Alexander report in reference to that very matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. The Alexander report says:

> The facts contained in the foregoing report show that it is the almost universal practice for steamship lines engaging in the American foreign trade to operate, both on the inbound and outbound voyages, under the terms of written agreements, conference arrangements, or gentlemen's understandings, which have for their principal purpose the regulation of competition through either (1) the fixing or regulation of rates; (2) the apportionment of traffic by alloting the ports of sailing, restricting the number of sailings, or limiting the volume of freight which certain lines may carry; (3) the pooling of earnings from all or a portion of the traffic; or (4) meeting the competition of nonconference lines. Eighty such agreements or understandings, involving practically all the regular steamship lines operating on nearly every American foreign-trade route, are described in the foregoing report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield further.

Mr. REED. Whether the Senator is willing to yield or is not willing to yield, there is reply made to the statement that is so plain and simple——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I am appealing to the Senator, not to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is out of order.

Mr. REED. I am not asking the Senator to yield, and I shall assert my right as a Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order, and the Chair will direct the Sergeant at Arms to cause him to resume his seat if he shall persist.

Mr. REED. Very well. I will ask the Senator to yield until I finish my sentence.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order and in defiance of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Washington yielded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declined to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said I declined to yield, but I now yield to the Senator to finish his sentence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may proceed.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course the Chair is obliged to have the rules observed.

Mr. REED. I have been observing the rules, sir, and with due courtesy—a thing that, I think, has not been extended to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A Senator has a right to decline to yield to another Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator to complete his statement.

Mr. REED. That is what I was trying to say, that there is a simple answer to that statement, and I shall reply to it in my own time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask the Senator to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think I will have to decline to yield now. I will yield the floor in a very short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The trouble is, when a Senator yields to another, one statement leads to a retort, the retort leads to a rejoinder, and that to a surrejoinder.

Mr. President, the fundamental question involved in the Panama Canal is to develop it to its full extent as a basic regulator of freight rates, and all matters which have been referred to, such as lumber, which I mentioned, are only the incidents. It is not only the great shipments of bulky products, such as lumber and apples from Washington and Oregon and oranges and other fruit from California to the Atlantic coast, the price of which will be affected by cheap or expensive transportation in the Panama Canal, but it is clothing and shoes, manufactured articles of every description necessary to the civilization of the west coast, shipped from the east coast, whose price to the millions of people on the Pacific coast will be affected by the tonnage dues levied on ships going through the canal.

Whatever Senators may say, when we know that it is a universal law of those who control transportation to get out of it what they can, as the phrase is, to levy upon traffic all that it will bear, it is not they who will be paying these tolls, but it is the people who buy the freight, the merchandise carried in these ships, and every dollar that is levied upon it will be added to the freight rate on the transportation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Five days ago I submitted a Senate resolution, which has gone over from day to day, that I think I might well have insisted should take precedence over this discussion. I did not do so, supposing that this question would be disposed of in a short time.

I beg to say to the Senator from Washington, who is always courteous, that of necessity I leave Washington this afternoon. It would take me about 15 minutes to submit the observations I have to submit on my resolution, and I trust that this matter will be disposed of as speedily as possible.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am glad to have the admonition of the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say that I suppose I could speak on this matter or perhaps on the unfinished business, but I would prefer to do it in the ordinary and, I think, the proper way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think there are other Senators who want to be heard on this matter, but I shall conclude in a very short time. I do not want to interfere, and I would yield to the Senator, if it becomes necessary, to allow the Senator to present what he has referred to.

I know it is argued by some of the advocates of this repeal that the Panama Canal will not be a substantial competitor of the railroads, and that it is a negligible factor in reducing freight rates. I regard it, Mr. President, if it is not shackled by some law such as is now proposed to be placed upon the statute books by this repeal, as the basis upon which all transcontinental freight rates will be calculated, because necessarily it will be the cheapest route, and all other rates will have to be fixed upon that basis, with such changes as different circumstances of time or locality may enable the railroads to fix.

I want to call attention to our actual experience with competing waterways as affecting railroad rates. I have two very conspicuous instances. One of them is the rate upon wheat from Chicago to New York by rail, or by water, or partly by rail and partly by water. The other one is the rate which formerly obtained upon grain and flour from St. Louis to Liverpool, being shipped by one route—by water to New Orleans, thence by water to Liverpool; and by the other route—by rail to New York, thence transshipped to Liverpool.

In the first instance, quoting from the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1912, in 1871 the all-rail rate per bushel on wheat from Chicago to New York was 31 cents; by lake and canal it was 20 cents—11 cents a bushel less. In 1881 the all-rail rate was 14.4 cents; by water it was 8.19 cents. In 1890, by the continuous operation of this water competition, the rates had gone down by rail to 14.31 cents a bushel, whereas by water they were 5.85 cents per bushel.

So the process continued until 1912, when, by the effect of this water competition, the railroad rates upon wheat from Chicago to New York, per bushel, were 9.60 cents, while by water, by lake and canal, the rate per bushel was 5.57 cents.

In this connection, I ask leave to print as a part of my remarks a table giving these comparative rates through the intervening years that I have not mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, such will be the order. The Chair hears none.

The table referred to is as follows:

[3] Averages based upon officially published tariffs; actual rates lower.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Here is a statement showing from actual experience the effect of water competition such as will be afforded by the Panama Canal if it is not obstructed by tolls; and I want to say that we can, by the line of a pen, fix the rate so high that it would obstruct the traffic so as to make the canal as if it had never been built. Every cent that is levied upon traffic going through there operates just the same as though it were a physical obstruction, minimizing to that extent the effect of the canal as a line of transportation in the interest of the country and as regulating railroad rates.

In 1890 the rates on wheat per bushel from St. Louis to Liverpool via New Orleans by water were 14.33 cents; from St. Louis to Liverpool via rail to New York, 21.48 cents per bushel. In 1903 on wheat per bushel from St. Louis to Liverpool via New Orleans by the river route the rate was 10 cents; via New York by rail, 16.02 cents.

I ask leave to print as a part of my remarks a table bearing out to a greater extent than I care to read at this time the comparative rates by these two routes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is granted unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, Mr. President, this letter says further:

To the same effect have spoken also President Roosevelt, President Taft, former Secretary of State Olney, former Attorney General Bonaparte, and ex-Secretary of State and Attorney General Philander C. Knox, not to mention other names of almost equal dignity and authority.

Certainly there is nothing objectionable in that paragraph.

How can dishonor attach to Americans who assert and defend national rights which have been affirmed so impressively, and which were virtually conceded by the English Government, when Senator ROOT invited a renewal of its abandoned contentions in his speech of January 21, 1913? If the American position is warranted by a fair interpretation of the treaty, and "not in plain contravention" of it, there can be no obligation of honor to relinquish what is ours by right.

That the force of this proposition is felt by the repealers is shown by their shift from an appeal to "honor" to an appeal to our magnanimity. To use the phrase of the President, we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, so that "we may deserve our reputation for generosity." In other words, the repealers "want us to do it." The President asks that he be indulged in his wish "in ungrudging measure." "I ask this of you," says he in his speech of March 5 to Congress. This is all there is to the question.

I fail to see anything in that paragraph which would violate any rule of propriety or any rule of ethics with reference to the President, because it quotes his speech. I think myself that the Presidents' message was a most remarkable one in that it asked this country to abandon the position which it had taken without giving reasons for it. He rather puts aside the question of the treaty, as I recall the address at this minute, and bases his request, so far as that is concerned, upon the proposition that foreign countries give a different interpretation to the treaty from that which the advocates of coastwise exemption give to it, and he does say that we should reverse our action without questioning whether we were right or wrong. I think that is quite remarkable.

I think it is also very remarkable that the President urges that there are great reasons of nearer consequence and greater delicacy—arousing, naturally, a great deal of curiosity as to what they are—calling for this almost unprecedented action; that he did not state in the message which this letter referred to what those reasons and matters were, and from that day to this, notwithstanding the energetic measures of those of us who want to give full consideration to the President's views to ascertain what those matters were, we are still in ignorance in regard to them.

Senators upon the other side who have visited the President to consult with him about this matter have come back and made public statements in writing, delivered to newspapers for publication, in which they likewise are silent as to what these matters are. They simply say that they will support the President in this matter because he wants it.

I think that the letter is perfectly proper in that regard in its estimate of the President's message, and as it seems to be necessary to reassure at every step in referring to this matter, I say that in making that comment I do it with all due respect to the President and to his office.

The letter goes on to say—

After trying to subject us to a sort of moral intimidation—

I think that is a very good phrase; there is nothing objectionable about it—by representing the national honor as hanging in the balance, the repealers next tried to frighten us into compliance by picturing the nations of the world as united in protest against our course. But no protest was forthcoming except England's—

I think that is correct, so far as the Senate is informed at least—

which was as half-hearted as it is graceless and unworthy of the nation, which profits so immeasurably more than we from our own labor and expenditure. The "matters of delicacy and near consequence" turn out to be only a broken-down alibi.

I do not understand what that is, but I see nothing objectionable in it.

That there are none such is now admitted.

I think it must be admitted that there are none such. If there were great, pressing reasons that involved the safety of this country of near consequence and greater delicacy, it seems to me almost certain that by this time we would have been informed what they were. So, I think that this writer is justified in saying that there turned out to be none such. In fact, I think every statement coming from the White House is to the effect that there were none such, brushing this mysterious intimation aside with the remark that it just referred to the general situation.

Some people seem to think that it was because we needed the assistance of Great Britain in dealing with Mexico. It has nothing to do with Mexico; and it would be unworthy of this country to buy the support of England or of any other country. I do not think that that was the reason referred to. We are naturally left to guesswork as to what the reasons were, because such action would have been unworthy of us; we did not need it; and there is no President nor any department of the Government occupying this great trust of the American people that would be justified, if that is the reason, in giving up the complete sovereignty of this canal because of the situation in Mexico or relations with Japan or with any other country.

What are the "matters of nearer consequence and greater delicacy"? I think we ought to know; and if this letter is incorrect in saying that there are none, it seems to me that some Senator who is exercised about this letter ought to inform us now what those matters are.

I think this is right good, too:

A witty reviewer once said, "As you turn the pages of one of George Meredith's novels the suspense of the author is almost unbearable." As we note the horrific megrims and melancholy sunpains of the repealers—

I do not like that language myself—and their visions of a world arrayed against us in sullen distrust, it is difficult for us to realize that we have about completed a stupendous benefaction to mankind, which it hails with grateful expectancy of new gains and hitherto undreamed-of expansions.

In the letter of Sir Edward Grey, in which the complete case of Great Britain was stated, he points out the tremendous advantages to the great trade of Great Britain which will come from the construction of the Panama Canal. He calls attention to the distances that will be shortened. We all know the policy which has actuated the Government of Great Britain from time immemorial to control the commerce of the world. This canal will be one of the greatest aids to the commerce of Great Britain, whether we exempt our coastwise trade or not; yet not having paid a dollar toward its construction, not having worried herself about it, and repudiating in his letter itself any responsibility for the canal, Sir Edward Grey says that certainly Great Britain does not expect to be responsible in any degree—I am not quoting his exact language—for the maintenance or the protection of this canal.

Did they do anything to aid us in acquiring these rights from the Panama Canal Co.—not only those rights, but the canal itself? In settling the difficult questions with the Republic of Colombia and the Republic of Panama did Great Britain help us there? Did Great Britain ever have a protectorate or a position at Panama or any consideration which she surrendered which would entitle her in equity to participate on equal terms with the United States in the benefits of this canal? She did have at one time a foothold at the Atlantic terminus of the Nicaragua route. In 1848 Great Britain had seized Greytown as one of her positions there. She gave a cocked hat to some Indian chief and established him under the protectorate of Great Britain as the King of the Mosquito Indians. She then sent her men to cooperate with those Indians in seizing from the Nicaraguan Government the Atlantic terminus of the Nicaragua route. Naturally there was excitement in the United States. Our country was aroused about that, for in those days I think American sentiment was more virile than it now is; the advocacy of the Monroe doctrine was more aggressive. This act of Great Britain was regarded as a violation of the Monroe doctrine, and the people of this country were aroused because Great Britain had seized, under the guise of supporting those Mosquito Indians, the terminal which was necessary to the completion of the canal that the United States thought about constructing at that time.

It was the possession of Greytown and other protectorates and influences which Great Britain had in Nicaragua and in Central America which she surrendered as the consideration for what was agreed to in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Notwithstanding all that might be said in denunciation of that treaty, still there was some consideration for that; but if the construction which is here sought to be placed upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty should prevail, with no consideration whatever on the part of Great Britain, that would be a far more stupendous piece of folly than the Clayton-Bulwer treaty ever was.

In the first place, Great Britain did not carry out the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; she did not give up Greytown for 10 years after the treaty was ratified, as she had agreed to do, and she has never yet given up her protectorates and her influences in Central America. She has a colony at Belize to this day, in plain violation, through all the years when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was supposed to be in effect, of its terms; but none of those terms related to the Panama Canal. It seems to me that is plain from one consideration. Great Britain never contended that she had any interest in the Panama Canal while the French were constructing it; Great Britain never claimed that she had any interest in the Panama Railroad during all the years that it was in operation before the United States acquired any right in it; and yet, if she had any interest in the canal, she likewise had an interest in the railroad, because railroad and canal go hand in hand; they are named side by side in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Great Britain never claimed that she had a right to say one word as to rates or conditions or rules of this great canal which the great French people were building, and which the world had no reason to suppose they would not complete, as they had completed the Suez Canal. It is only now that the United States is involved that it is discovered that Great Britain, through some vague, mysterious influences which she had in the Caribbean Sea, had a right to object to the construction of an interoceanic canal at Panama. If France could build it, if a private company could build it, and was building it, without protest from Great Britain, why could not the great United States, guaranteeing to treat all nations alike, build it, of course doing with regard to herself as she chooses? The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in rule 1 of article 3, I believe, says what? It says that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

It has been pointed out that of course that would not include the United States, because rules 3, 4, 5, and 6, in the same article, it is admitted, do not apply to the United States and can not apply to the United States, because we are proceeding to fortify the canal and preparing to harbor our ships of war, if necessary, in its vicinity; and it is absurd to say that if we were belligerents we could not do the things inhibited by those rules. But suppose rule 2 applies, and that all nations are to be placed on terms of entire equality as to conditions and charges of traffic, and that such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable.

Every lawyer in this body knows what "equitable" means or has some conception of its meaning. They shall be equitable; the conditions and charges shall be on terms of entire equality to all nations—you say, "including the United States." Courts of equity were created to relieve litigants from the harshness of the law, to adjust in an equitable manner conditions which were not possible of enforcement under the strict, literal interpretation of instruments. Suppose a court of equity were to take this rule and we would concede for the sake of the argument, which in fact we deny, that it applies to the Panama Canal and includes the United States, do you suppose there is a respectable court in the world that, in order to make it equitable, in order to make it just, in order to make the conditions equal alike to all nations, would not require all other nations to bear their share of the expense and the burden not only of the acquirement but of the construction and of the maintenance and of the protection of this canal? If the contention of Great Britain and those who are supporting her without question as to whether we are right or wrong should prevail, that would not be equitable; that would not be just. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty says that it shall be both just and equitable, but that would not be upon terms of entire equality, because we have paid $400,000,000, and they have not paid a cent. The American people know that, and without the refinements of legal reasoning and without knowledge of the letters hidden in the diplomatic correspondence of the United States and Great Britain, the instinctive sense of justice of the American people has led them to the true conclusion in this matter, as it nearly always does.

Now, Mr. President, this letter says:

> The Republic of Panama has granted by treaty to the United States, and I quote from the treaty, "all the rights, power, and authority," within the Canal Zone and the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters "which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority." And England, in its note of November 14, 1912, conceded "that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal."

They do concede that; and upon that concession, in what I think is an involved and labored document on behalf of Great Britain, they reconcile the otherwise glaring inconsistency of an attempt to apply rule 2 to the United States while not applying rules 3, 4, 5, and 6.

Earl Grey admits that rules 3, 4, 5, and 6—and if the numbers which I give are not correct I beg leave to correct them; I think they are correct—which prohibit acts of belligerency in the canal, which prohibit the accumulation of munitions of war in the canal, which require that the ships of a belligerent shall not remain in the canal longer than is necessary for a quick transit and shall not revictual there, and that the ship of one belligerent shall leave not less than 24 hours after the ship of another belligerent shall have left—he admits that those rules do not apply to the United States. Why does he say that they do not apply? Because he says, as this letter recites, and recites correctly and in a perfectly inoffensive manner, that when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made it was not contemplated that the United States would be sovereign of the territory through which the canal was constructed. He says in effect that since the treaty was made—and I will verify, if necessary, my statement of the substance of Sir Edward Grey's letter; it is available and accessible to every Senator—that it was not contemplated that the United States would be sovereign of the canal strip, and that, having become sovereign, the rules of this article do not apply. The only logical deduction from that is that the treaty does not apply. It could not apply.

In the first place—though I do not think it is important or necessary in this discussion—if you will examine the correspondence, the first Panama Canal act of Congress, and the discussions you will find that at the time the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was framed and proclaimed the United States had no idea of building a canal at Panama. That treaty not only did not contemplate, as Sir Edward Grey says, that the United States would be sovereign of that territory, but it did not contemplate that the canal would be located there. It is true that there is general language applying rule 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to any interoceanic canal wherever located, but, as I have previously stated, that was an agreement to make a treaty in regard to a canal to be built by a third party under the joint protection of the two nations.

It is perfectly obvious that in a work of such stupendous magnitude, where the canal is located under different conditions and at a different place from the place which they had in view at that time, it would be necessary to make a special treaty with reference, as the treaty says, to that particular object. That is what article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provides, the United States and Great Britain establishing a general principle in addition to the particular object of the canal at Nicaragua, will agree to. They do not say that they establish certain rules and regulations in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but say that they agree to do so by treaty stipulations. They say further that the condition which they contemplated at that time was a canal to be constructed by a third party and to be jointly protected by both. There is nothing improper in that in this letter.

> Was there ever such a spectacle seen before?—

It goes on—

> What can it mean?

That is a legitimate inquiry. What can it mean? I should like to know what it means. I really should like to know, aside from the importance of it, just as a matter of curiosity, what these "matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" were; and there is no harm in an inquiry on the part of this writer as to what it means.

> The President—

He says—

> and Secretary of State—

Now, this language I would not use myself, but I do not think there is anything particularly offensive in it—smarting under the charge that they have dragooned their party into a betrayal of its platform—

I do not like the language that he uses, but there is nothing insulting about it and nothing offensive other than being a sharp allegation. I do not like the word "dragooned"; but never before in my recollection, at least—and ever since I can recollect I have been a more or less close observer of public events and a reader of transactions—has there been a time—and I am at a loss to understand the reason for it now—when the administration, I will not say has "dragooned" its party, as this writer says, but has so overwhelmed its party with the wishes of the President—regardless of his views, and even when he does not state his views—as President Wilson has in this administration. I think it is proper to call attention to that.

I have been somewhat depressed at times, in view of the great record the President has made in certain matters of legislation during the early part of his administration, feeling an admiration for many things he has done, to see the lack of independence on the part of Congress, and on the contrary the express statement on the part even of Senators that they did not have to have any reason—that was the substance of it—that they were willing to do as the President wished; that he was responsible, and they would support him. That is not a healthy condition for the country, and it is not creditable to the Senate of the United States.

I think the President is entitled to the support of every man in the Senate, Democrat or otherwise, when he is right. I believe Senators are sent here by their States to use their judgment as to whether the President or anybody else is right. I resent the imputation, and I believe if I were a Democrat I would resent it, that it is improper to assert and to act upon my own views as a Senator and a representative of a great State in this Union of States when I differ with the President of the United States, and that we are not free to point out these differences, and to criticize and to analyze the reasons and the actions of the President—retort that the plank in favor of an exemption from toll payment of our coastwise shipping was furtively slipped into the platform and is nothing but a successful imposture.

I have not heard the charge that it was "furtively slipped in," but I have heard it was slipped in. I have heard the excuse that it was slipped in. Of course, on the merits of the question it does not make any difference whether it was in the platform or not; yet it is a legitimate subject of discussion. There are a great many people throughout the country who are compelled, instead of informing themselves in regard to the facts and arguments on all the public questions that come up, to follow their party. The great articles of faith of the parties in these four-year Olympiads of party existence are party platforms. Men make up their minds and vote upon those platforms. When we come to action with the party in power which solicited the votes of the American people upon the strength of the principles declared in its platform, it is perfectly proper and natural that they should at once inquire, if this plank was slipped into the platform, how many others were slipped in. It destroys the confidence of the people in the platform as a whole; and in public discussion, in view of the elections which are to take place in the future, it becomes material to call attention to those circumstances. It is just as easy to say that some other plank was slipped in as to say that this one was. There is no more reason why they should give that excuse in regard to one than in regard to the other.

The letter says:

They are promptly obliged to have recourse to another defense, however, when the fact is recalled that the Secretary of State was the chairman of the convention committee which reported the platform; that the plank in question was referred to a subcommittee, discussed in full committee, amended, and debated in the open convention before adoption. Besides there is the President's telltale speech to the New Jersey farmers, in which he extolled the exemption feature of the Panama act a few days after its passage, and explained its operation as a check to excessive transcontinental freight charges.

Their next excuse was that the platform pledge was not binding because in conflict with the party's attitude of opposition to subsidies. Further than this panic can not drive. If this is what subsidy means, then every deepened waterway and broadened channel, every lock and every canal, on our lakes, along our coasts, upon our rivers, built by national appropriations and used by our shipping, is a subsidy. The Democratic Party, not less than other parties, has had its honorable share in these great internal improvements.

This cry of subsidy has been raised most disingenuously. It merits close examination. A Member of the Senate has stated that 92 per cent of our coastwise shipping is under control of the railroads and by terms of the Panama act is excluded altogether from use of the canal. The repealers omit to mention the fact that England's protest is directed not only against the exemption of our coastwise shipping from toll payment, but also against our exclusion of railroad-owned ships.

If the principle is once conceded that we have no right to adopt such regulations as we see fit within the domestic sphere of our coastwise shipping, it follows automatically that we have no right to bar railroad-owned ships from the canal. Thus it clearly appears that, despite the effort to discredit the opposition to repeal by raising the hue and cry of privilege and special interest, the truth is that monopoly—the monopoly of coastwise as well as transcontinental carriage—is ranged on the side of the repealers.

If the Senators, and particularly the Senator from Georgia, are of the opinion that there is a monopoly of coastwise shipping, I should like to inquire if he can furnish us with some proof as to which side of this question that monopoly is on. I do not know myself. I ask the question in perfect good faith.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say, in answer to the Senator, that I think there is no doubt about the fact that they are anxious to have their vessels go through free.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have a great deal of doubt about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think they are far more interested in having them go through free than the transcontinental railroads are in having them pay, and I think I can demonstrate it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If this monopoly of coastwise ships, as has been asserted, is controlled by the railroads, I fail to see why it should want its vessels to go through free; and I do not agree with the deduction, which seems to me merely a deduction or an assumption, on the part of the Senator. What I asked for was some specific proof as to which side the shipping interests were on. I do not imagine they are concerning themselves about it at the present time, because most of the lines of ships engaged in the coastwise trade are not likely to go through the Panama Canal. They are likely to stay on the routes of local trade in which they are already engaged and which seem to absorb their capacity. All of the inferences I could draw from the situation would lead to the conclusion that if there is a monopoly of the coastwise shipping it would be in favor of tolls upon coastwise shipping, not only because, as stated, it is largely controlled by the railroads, against which the canal is the greatest competitive factor that has appeared upon the scene, but because a monopoly, with all the advantages it can control, can take care of the tolls and use them as a means of excluding competition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to suggest to the Senator that on the Atlantic coast the railroads controlling coastwise vessels are not transcontinental railroads. They are largely north-and-south railroads. They are railroads that extend but a short distance to the interior; and the passage of vessels through the canal will in no way compete with the business which these railroads do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If their ships are engaged in local trade on the Atlantic coast, is the Senator informed that they are going to be taken off of that trade and put into trade through the Panama Canal? My understanding has been that whatever ships go through the Panama Canal will very likely have to be new lines.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say that; but the Senator said that the railroads owning them would be interested in maintaining the tolls. I wish to ask the Senator why they should be interested, when they do not do a transcontinental business?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I imagine that most of our domestic ships going through the Panama Canal, when they do go through, will be engaged in trading between our Atlantic and our Pacific ports. Every one of those ships will be in competition with the transcontinental railroads.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator if he is familiar with the size of the corporation that controls the vessels doing business with Hawaii?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the immensity of their business and how they have grown?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am entirely familiar with it. That is a concern under Southern Pacific Railroad domination.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator name a stockholder in it that is an officer of the Southern Pacific or that has any real connection with it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I can not name one at this moment. The matter has been written and published at great length.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have seen a copy of a letter, and I think it is in my committee room now, written by the manager of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. to the chairman of the Interoceanic Canals Committee, saying that it is a matter of utter indifference to that company whether they have exemption from tolls or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I imagine that so far as concerns that particular line of ships, plying between Hawaii and San Francisco, it would be indifferent; but so far as concerns the Pacific Mail ships, plying from San Francisco to Panama, and there transshipping their cargoes by rail across the Isthmus, I can readily imagine that they might extend their lines to the Atlantic ports. When they do they will be in competition with the railroads. If the railroads are to continue to hold them, of course the canal will not be a real competitor of the railroads. So far as tolls are levied upon them, it will lessen to that extent, cent by cent, the amount of competition or interference with what is at present a great traffic monopoly of transcontinental freight. As I said before, that monopoly affects not only the seacoast towns but every town whose rates are affected by water transportation, which can be reached from the sea, and inland rates near the sea. Such a place is my town, which is in what might be called the intermountain country, a great thriving business center, young, but with some 110,000 population, 400 miles from the ocean, but whose rates are based fundamentally upon the rates to Pacific coast points. We will be affected by it. There is not a public improvement in process of construction, or that ever has been constructed in the United States, which will have such general and almost universal effect upon all parts of the United States as the Panama Canal will have upon our economics and upon that great fundamental factor which affects us more than government, more than taxes, and more than manufactures, namely, transportation. It regulates the lives, the growth, the relative strength and wealth of cities, the existence of towns, and the bankruptcy or the prosperity of individuals engaging in business.

The letter proceeds:

It is only an effort by the railroad interests which for a generation have waged a cunning and desperate fight—

I hope nobody will object to that language. It is rather sharp language, but I think it has been cunning. I do not know that it has been so desperate, because they usually have had the upper hand and have had things pretty much their own way, and so they have not been required to be desperate; but they waged a cunning fight.

The letter proceeds:

against every project for an isthmian canal. It is not forgotten that the railroads had their watchful representation on the board of the ill-starred Nicaraguan Canal Co.

That is quite a significant fact which this letter states; and knowing the writer of it as I do, I attach some importance to it.

It is also remembered that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was acquired by the transcontinental railroads and for years held in a pooled ownership to protect the railroad monopoly of freight transportation across the continent.

I know from information of the most reliable kind which has come to me for years that that statement is true, and it is not offensive in any legitimate sense which should exclude it from public discussion.

I think that sometimes Senators are too sensitive about what is offensive and what is not offensive, and while I have refrained most carefully from using any offensive language, my opinion is that the Senate of the United States can not enhance its dignity before the country by being supersensitive as to what is said about it or about any member of it.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF GRAIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] if he is anxious to proceed now, or may I occupy a few minutes in discussing a matter I have been trying to get up for five days?

Mr. NELSON. I am ready to go on, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has the floor and that the unfinished business does not take him off the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly it does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He could proceed with his speech, if he saw fit.

Mr. SMOOT. By unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is no limitation on the right to speak upon anything a Senator wants to speak about. Frequently I have seen a Senator who had the floor when another matter came up go on with his speech. I regret that the rules permit it, but they do. I have been very anxious to have an opportunity to reply somewhat to the Senator from Washington while his speech was still fresh, but if he is not going to conclude to-day, I will have to wait until he does conclude.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Georgia is perfectly correct in stating that many times a Senator has proceeded with his speech after the unfinished business has been laid before the Senate, but in order that he may proceed he must address the Chair and be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He has at least the same right to be recognized as anyone else.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gallinger	Perkins	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hitchcock	Pittman	Smoot
Brady	Hollis	Poindexter	Sterling
Brandegee	Jones	Pomerene	Stone
Bristow	Kern	Ransdell	Thomas
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Tillman
Burton	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Townsend
Catron	Lippitt	Root	Vardaman
Chilton	McCumber	Saulsbury	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Shafroth	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Nelson	Sheppard	Weeks
Cummins	Oliver	Simmons	West
Dillingham	Overman	Smith, Ariz.	Works
Fall	Page	Smith, Ga.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] are necessarily absent on business of the Senate. I also announce that my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily absent.

Mr. HOLLIS. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is absent on official business of the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. My colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent on account of an important engagement.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

I wish also to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], who has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. WALSH. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. MYERS], due to his continued illness.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

FOREIGN BOUNTY-PAID VESSELS AND THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not felicitate myself that the quorum which has just been secured will long remain, because it is a matter of common knowledge that there perhaps never has been a time in the history of our country when less attention was given to the transaction of public business.

Mr. President, were it not for the fact that I am about to leave the city this afternoon, I would not further disturb the continuity of the discussion on the grain-inspection bill by addressing myself to a different subject. On the 20th day of this month I offered a resolution which went over under the rule, and because the morning hour has been devoted day after day to the discussion of matters not strictly morning business, I have been unable to have the resolution laid before the Senate. I now ask that the resolution may be read from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 342, submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 20th instant, as follows:

Whereas all nations largely engaged in commerce now pay either indirectly or specifically the tolls of their principal national lines of steamships passing through the Suez Canal and are preparing to make the same provisions for payment out of the national treasuries of tolls for their vessels which may seek to pass through the Panama Canal; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, acting on the urgent recommendation of the President, is now legislating with a view to provide that tolls shall be paid in full by all American ships which may be engaged in both the coastwise and foreign trade at Panama, so that American ships will probably be the only ships which will be required to pay tolls for the use of this great waterway, built by the United States Government at a cost of nearly $400,000,000 of the money of the American people: Therefore be it

Resolved, That, in the event of the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act being repealed, in order to establish equality between American and foreign ships in the matter of the payment of tolls, no vessel of foreign register, whose owner or owners receive a subsidy or bounty of any kind whatsoever in connection with tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, shall be permitted to enter or pass through said canal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senator for a few minutes while I discuss the resolution that has just been read.

The annual report of the United States Commissioner of Navigation for the fiscal year 1911 states, under the heading "Suez Canal Tolls," on page 15:

Whether other nations shall see fit to appropriate money from their treasuries to pay Panama tolls on merchant vessels under their respective flags is a matter for them to determine. If they do so, they will be well within their treaty rights, as it is well within ours to provide a permanent annual appropriation from the Treasury to pay the tolls on all American ships. To hold otherwise is to assert that we have bound ourselves to do nothing to promote our own shipping, in the full knowledge that foreign nations will pay, directly or indirectly, Panama tolls as they already pay part of the Suez tolls on their respective mercantile fleets.

And again, on page 16 of the annual report for 1911, the Commissioner of Navigation states:

The total tonnage passing through the Suez Canal in 1910 was 16,581,900 net tons. The fleet of the British Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. is the largest using the canal, its tonnage aggregating 1,214,200 net tons. Its last printed report shows that its Suez Canal dues on ships and passengers in 1910 were £357,989 4s. 7d. and its subsidies £297,143 6s. 8d. The subsidy is paid to its mail steamers, but it operates slower boats. The principal German passenger steamship line to the Orient is the North German Lloyd, which has an annual subsidy of 5,280,000 marks ($1,385,160) for its mail steamers to Asia and Australia. In 1910 the company's fleet made 94 Suez voyages, for which the subsidy would have sufficed to pay all the tolls and leave a handsome margin.

A Japanese subsidy of $1,336,947 was paid to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for its steamers through Suez to Europe, aggregating 326,000 tons. In 1908 the Messageries Maritimes, the largest French company using the canal, was paid for its lines to China, Japan, Australia, and Madagascar $2,145,232 in subsidies, and its canal tonnage in 1909 was 565,200 net tons.

The actual payments by foreign Governments of specific Suez Canal tolls on merchant vessels under their respective flags is illustrated by the following documents.

In the case of Russia, the American embassy at St. Petersburg, under date of September 3, 1908, wrote:

"I have the honor to state that the ministry for commerce and industry has given me the following information: * * *

"'The only appropriation which has been fixed for navigation bounties for the current year is the sum of 650,000 rubles set aside for the purpose of repaying from the public moneys the dues exacted of Russian vessels passing through Suez Canal to and from Russian ports.'"

In the case of Austria, the Emperor Franz Joseph, at Vienna, on February 23, 1907, signed a law of the Austrian Reichsrath ratifying the subsidy and mail contract of the Austrian Government with the Austrian Lloyd Steamship Co. After providing an annual subsidy of 4,700,000 crowns for the company, the contract ratified by the Reichsrath contains the following article—

The article is written in German, and as I am not a German scholar and the distinguished senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who was partly educated at Heidelberg, is not here to read it for me, I will pass it over without reading.

"Der Gesellschaft werden auch die für die Durchfahrt des Suezkanals auf den Linien 9, 10, 11 und 12 bezahlten Gebühren gegen Vorlage der bezüglichen Rechnungen rückersetzt."

Of course, this means—

I am still quoting from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation—that the Austrian treasury, besides the subsidies, will pay annually the tolls on the following Austrian merchant voyages through the Suez Canal: From Trieste, 12 voyages to Bombay, 13-knot steamers; 6 to Bombay, 10-knot steamers; 12 to Calcutta, 10-knot steamers; and 12 to Kobe, 10-knot steamers. The law and contract were printed in the Reichsgesetzblatt (Official Gazette) of February 28, 1907, part 22, page 284, filed in this bureau.

In the case of Sweden, the Swedish royal foreign office on May 26, 1908, advised the American minister at Stockholm:

"The Maritime Navigation Co. (Svenska Ostasiatiska Kompaniet) received from the State for the years 1907–11 a subvention of 1,850,000 crowns to insure a regular service between Sweden and the ports of the extreme Orient. This subvention has been calculated, in a manner, to represent the amount of the tolls paid by the ships of the company for passing the Suez Canal."

The international rule against discrimination for the Panama Canal is in the same words as for the Suez Canal.

FRENCH SUEZ CANAL TOLL REFUND.

The French Government a little more than a year ago arranged to repay the bulk of the tolls on its principal line of steamships through the Suez Canal, making allowance for these tolls in addition to the regular subsidies.

On July 22, 1912, the new 25-year ocean-mail contract (expiring November 30, 1937) between the French Government and the Messageries Maritime Steamship Co. went into effect.

Article 3 of the contract reads:

ART. 3. The tolls based on tonnage for transit through the Suez Canal paid by the company on its subsidized ships shall be reimbursed to the company in addition to the subsidy, according to the provisions of article 96 of the schedule of charges and obligations: Provided, That during the temporary period covered by that schedule the expenses of passing through the Suez Canal of ships on the route to Haiphong shall be paid by the company.

Article 96, referred to in article 3, reads:

ART. 96. * * * The amount of reimbursement of the special navigation toll on tonnage through the Suez Canal is payable monthly at the end of the month at the same time as the subvention according to the estimates of expenses based on the figures for the previous year, with the reservation of adjustment of balances at the end of the business year based on tolls actually paid.

During the calendar year 1911 the voyages of the steamers of the Messageries Maritimes through the Suez Canal numbered 172; tonnage, 603,400; so the Suez tolls amounted to about $850,000. The toll rate for 1912 is 50 centimes (9¼ cents) less than in 1911, or on the same tonnage the tolls will be about $750,000. The contract calls for 156 Suez-Canal-toll-refunded voyages annually, the toll to be refunded amounting to about $680,000. The 26 voyages to Haiphong on which temporarily there is no refund are not included.

FRANCE AND THE PANAMA CANAL.

In the Daily Consular and Trade Reports for Monday, April 13, 1914, page 219, there is the following report from Mr. John Ball Osborne, American consul at Havre:

At a meeting on March 17, 1914, the Chamber of Commerce of Havre discussed a report of its committee on the marine in relation to the utilization of the Panama Canal by the merchant marine of France and adopted the following recommendations to the Government:

"That the public powers make haste to conclude an amendment to the postal convention of 1911 with the Compagnie Generale Trans-Atlantique (French line) to the effect that the lines from Havre-Bordeaux to Colon and from St. Nazaire to Colon shall be extended through the Panama Canal to Valparaiso, and that the construction of the steamers intended for this service shall be begun without delay.

"That as soon as the conditions of utilizing the canal are better known attention shall be given to the prolongation to California and Canada of one of the lines having Havre as the point of departure."

There can be no doubt that the French Government will adopt in regard to this proposed line through the Panama Canal exactly the same plan of granting a subsidy to repay the tolls that has been adopted at Suez.

JAPAN AT THE PANAMA CANAL.

In the same issue of the Daily Consular and Trade Reports for April 13, 1914, on the same page, is a report from Mr. George H. Scidmore, the American consul general at Yokohama, quoting the Tokyo newspaper, the Asahi, to the effect that—

It is an open secret that before long the Government will introduce a bill to the Diet proposing a subsidy for the new Panama Canal service, and that simultaneously with the abandonment of the Seattle Line by the Nippon Yusen Kaisha the contract for the new Panama service will be let to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha.

The department of communications intended to open the Panama Canal route some time after the canal was opened and free passage of vessels was assured.

CANADIAN SUSIDIZED LINE TO THE WEST INDIES, WITH THROUGH RATES TO SOUTH AMERICA.

The Daily Consular and Trade Reports of May 24, 1913, stated that the Dominion Government had entered into a contract with the firm of Pickford & Black, of Halifax, for a 12-day ship service between Halifax and the West Indies. "The entire subsidy," it was stated, "will be paid by the Canadian Government. The boats are to ply directly between Canadian ports and the West Indies without the right to call at American ports."

The Daily Consular and Trade Reports for October 14, 1913, said, in a report from Consul General John G. Foster, at Ottawa:

Superseding the Government contract of last spring, reported in Daily Consular and Trade Reports for May 24, 1913, the Canadian minister of trade and commerce has closed a five-year contract with the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. for a fortnightly service from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to the West Indies, sailings to begin November 1, 1913.

The contract requires four vessels, each with a freight capacity of 5,000 tons and a speed of 11 or 12 knots at sea and suitable passenger accommodation. They are to sail from Halifax to the West Indies, returning via St. John, New Brunswick.

An arrangement has been made whereby perishable cargo will be taken from St. John to Halifax without increased cost. It is stated that the company has connections on both coasts of South America, so that through freight rates may be made on Canadian goods to ports other than those included in the trade agreement. Through rates for freight and bills of lading will be arranged from the principal commercial centers of eastern and central Canada.

The subsidy granted is £70,000 ($340,655) per annum and is contributed for the present by Canada alone, although it is anticipated that the West Indies will later on pay a portion of this subsidy.

Now, Mr. President, if the American Congress imposes full tolls on all American ships at Panama, both in the coastwise and in the foreign trade, why should not the American Congress bar from the canal foreign ships whose tolls are paid in subsidy from foreign Governments? Only by this course can the semblance of "entire equality" be secured for American ships.

Mr. President, it will be a cruel discrimination against American ships in the coastwise trade to require them to pay tolls through the Panama Canal when the ships of other nations will have their tolls paid by their respective Governments; but this is not all there is to this question. There is an avowed purpose in the minds of some public men to absolutely strike down the law which has been in operation for nearly 100 years prohibiting foreign ships from engaging in our coastwise trade. Several bills have recently been introduced into Congress with that end in view, and various utterances in the Senate along that line have been anything but encouraging to the friends of American shipping. In addition to these bills, the chairman of the Committee on Rules in another body has offered a resolution instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to show how much more cheaply British tramp steamers, manned by lascars and Chinese, can carry freight between our Atlantic and Pacific ports than can New England ships, manned by New England seamen. This appears to be a deliberate effort to prejudice the case against American shipping in favor of foreign shipping, and is one reason why in the past few days certain Republican Senators are asking themselves the question whether this is not another attempt to precipitate a clear-cut issue of protection or free trade between our ships and the ships of other nations, with the tremendous disadvantage on our part because of governmental aid in various forms that are given to foreign ships. In this connection a colloquy that occurred in the Senate on Thursday, April 9, 1914, is of interest. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in making an address was interrupted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who said:

I agree with the Senator as to the great benefits coming from commerce and as to the desirability of cheap water rates between our two coasts, but if these great benefits come from commerce, why should we not permit the vessels of other nations going through the canal to carry goods from one American port to the other?

Mr. THOMAS. There is no reason in the world which appeals to my judgment.

Mr. REED. I introduced a proposition of that kind. I simply wanted to get the Senator's opinion upon it. I think by letting all vessels engage in our coastwise trade, fixing a minimum charge, a small charge, we can solve this difficulty.

Mr. THOMAS. The policy for which I am contending, Mr. President, is entirely consistent with the purpose to be subserved by the bill which the Senator has introduced, and which, I believe, would result in an enormous benefit to the consumers of this country, so vast as to make the supposed benefit resulting from the present restriction of this coast trade to American-made and American-owned vessels wholly insignificant.

That language is clear and unmistakable, and leaves no room for doubt what the purpose of some men in public life is in regard to continuing the protection to our coastwise shipping granted by existing laws of the United States. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has to-day in debate again declared that he is in favor of repealing our coastwise laws, a most startling declaration. The simple fact is that if the free-tolls provision is to be repealed no subsidized ships, either domestic or foreign, should be allowed to pass through the Panama Canal. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] manifestly agrees to that proposition, for on the 27th day of March, in answer to a question that I propounded to that Senator, he promptly replied:

I can not agree to a subsidy through the Panama Canal to any ship, either American or British, and subsidized ships should not be permitted to go through the canal.

As before suggested, if the free-tolls provision is to be repealed and unsubsidized American ships are to be put in competition with subsidized ships of foreign governments, then legislation along the line suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma will be insisted upon by some of us.

If, Mr. President, on the plea that the language of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which provides that terms of "entire equality" shall be granted to all nations, the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act is to be repealed, then it is but reasonable to suppose that Congress will find a way to secure approximate equality for American ships by either granting from the Public Treasury a sum equivalent to the tolls on such ships, or else by legislating to absolutely prohibit all subsidized ships, foreign and domestic, from using the canal. Why should not that be done?

Mr. President, through commercial agreements in the nature of treaties, our merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade has been reduced to a mere shadow of what it was in the early days of the Republic, and it behooves us all to exercise the greatest possible care in the matter of legislation to see to it that our coastwise shipping does not meet with the same disastrous consequences. At the present time our coastwise fleet challenges comparison with that of any other country, and it will be the part of wisdom for Congress to continue to give it adequate protection and encouragement.

And in this connection it is pertinent and proper to ask what the effect upon public sentiment in this country will be if upon the opening of the Panama Canal full tolls are exacted from American ships, while their chief competitors are exempted by the subsidy and bounty of their Governments? The American people will not be slow to discover the discrimination against their own ships involved in a policy of that kind, and while it may be imposed upon them for a time they will not permanently rest content with it. A wave of wrath will inevitably follow any such grave discrimination against the American flag in an American canal, and the people of the United States will feel that they have been betrayed in the house of their friends.

During Mr. GALLINGER's speech,

Mr. SIMMONS. Would it interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire if I were to inquire whether he desires to ask for a vote on the resolution this afternoon?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I must be away, and I wished to ascertain that fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. I apprehend the resolution will either go to the calendar or lie over, as I know one other Senator at least desires to speak upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I have the assurance that the Senator will not ask for a vote, but will let it lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will do so; certainly.

After the conclusion of Mr. GALLINGER's speech,

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] states that he will not seek a vote upon his resolution this afternoon, I shall say but a few words. I desire, however, to call attention to the very great importance of his resolution. It should not be acted upon without elaborate and careful consideration; it should be referred to a committee for a report. It seeks, in a word, to exclude certain classes of vessels from the use of the Panama Canal, raising thereby a very important international question and substantially restricting the commerce which would be benefited by the opening of that great waterway.

I think the statements made in the preamble are not characterized by the accuracy usually employed by the Senator from New Hampshire. He states that—

Whereas all nations largely engaged in commerce now pay either indirectly or specifically the tolls of their principal national lines of steamships passing through the Suez Canal.

Mr. President, there are but three countries which specifically rebate tolls paid on vessels going through the Suez Canal. Those countries are Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Sweden. Other countries grant subsidies, as France; other countries, as Great Britain and Germany, pay very considerable compensation for the carriage of mail. In some instances such payment is less than the tolls and in others it is more.

We should consider the question of subsidy and the relation of ships which receive mail pay and subsidies passing through the Panama Canal separately from the main question which is soon to be before the Senate. That question, the repeal of the exemption from tolls granted to coastwise ships of the United States by the act of 1912, involves treaty engagements and international obligations. The other question of subsidy granted is one of domestic policy for each country. I would say that it would be best to dispose of the bill for the repeal of the exemption clause of the canal act and then to take up this resolution afterwards; but, in any event, the resolution should first be referred to a committee and careful consideration given to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. This morning when the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] was delivering his address he made a remark which I did not distinctly hear, but from which I inferred that he was discussing, at least incidentally, the question of our coastwise vessels and the fact that they were to some extent in combination. Believing it to be pertinent to the subject of his remarks, I inquired, in substance, whether the Senator did not agree with the proposition that our coastwise business might be open to the ships of all nations. The Senator's reply is immaterial to the present matter. Immediately the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] interrupted, as he had a right to do, with some remarks pertinent to the remarks I had made. The result was a colloquy carried on with the full consent of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. It reached the point, however, when the Senator from Washington declined to yield further, but shortly thereafter he did yield to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who directly replied to some remarks I had made during the colloquy, reading from a report which, apparently, was in conflict with what I had just said. Thereupon the following proceedings took place:

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield further.

Mr. REED. Whether the Senator is willing to yield or is not willing to yield, there is reply to the statement that is so plain and simple——

I want to say that when I was making these remarks I was addressing myself to the Senator who had the floor and was proffering to him a request to kindly yield me a moment to make a statement. My sentence was interrupted by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I am appealing to the Senator, not to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri is out of order.

Mr. REED. I am not asking the Senator to yield, and I shall assert my right as a Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order, and the Chair will direct the Sergeant at Arms that—

And this copy is here incorrect—"to seat the Senator," was the conclusion of the remark. Immediately after, when the Senator from Washington understood my request, he did yield. Then this appears:

Mr. REED. Very well. I will ask the Senator to yield until I finish my sentence.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is out of order, and in defiance of the rules of the Senate.

That was said after the Senator had yielded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Reporter got that wrong. The Chair intended to make no such statement. There was confusion as to what was transpiring at that time. The Chair only desired to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the Senator from Washington had declined to yield.

Mr. REED. It was made at that time, exactly as it is transcribed.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Washington yielded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington declined to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I said I declined to yield; but I now yield to the Senator to finish his sentence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is some confusion there, and the Chair would like to have the Senator from Missouri allow the Chair an opportunity to clear it up. The Senator from Missouri did not understand the Chair. At the time the Chair said the Senator was out of order and in defiance of the rules the Chair did not understand that the Senator from Washington had reconsidered or changed his refusal to yield. If that took place, it took place out of the hearing of the Chair.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I practiced law pretty actively for over a quarter of a century. No judge of a court ever had to call me to order, much less direct a sheriff to seat me. I have been a Member of this body a short time, comparatively—some three years—and I have never violated a rule of the Senate, to my knowledge. I think I know the rules of debate and the courtesies of debate, and I resent the action of the Chair in threatening to have the Sergeant at Arms seat me.

It happens every day upon the floor of the Senate—not once, but repeatedly—that a Senator will state that he declines to yield and that his fellow Senators will appeal to him directly, then, for the opportunity to say something, although there has been a declination. The request is proffered to his generosity and to his sense of fairness, and frequently it is granted. It was while I was doing that identical thing that is done upon the floor of the Senate scores of times in every week that the Chair proposed to have the Sergeant at Arms seat me.

I regard a statement of that kind from the Chair as personal to the last degree; I regard it as offensive to the last degree; I regard it as uncalled for and unnecessary; and I am making this statement now in order that the facts and circumstances under which this unpleasant incident occurred may appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair merely desires to say a word. There is nobody on the floor of the Senate with whom the Chair has established more pleasant relations than with the Senator from Missouri. It was not within the remotest purpose of the Chair to do anything that was offensive, and he now disclaims any such purpose. The Chair did not quite catch the purport of the remarks of the Senator, and he treated the whole statement as out of order. It appeared to the Chair that the Senator from Missouri was persisting in arguing the matter after the Senator from Washington had declined to yield, and under the specific terms of our rules it was the duty of the Chair to enforce that rule, and he proceeded to do so. The Senator from Missouri appeared to persist, although the Chair did not hear exactly what he said, although the Chair understood the Senator to say he was not addressing the Chair, or something of that sort; but it was the duty of the Chair to enforce the rules, and the Chair had no disposition to evade that duty or responsibility, notwithstanding it might bring him into unpleasant relations with one of the Senators on the floor.

With that explanation the Chair trusts the Senator from Missouri will consider it from that standpoint and then reach whatever conclusion may suit him. The Chair certainly had not any intention of being offensive to the Senator any further than the rules required him to enforce them.

Mr. REED. I simply make this final remark, that it occurs to me that the Chair might give to a Senator upon the floor the credit for knowing enough about the rules of proper procedure to allow him at least to conclude a sentence, which was denied me, as the RECORD shows, and it was followed afterwards. I do not care to prolong the matter; it will do no good; and if the Chair has made all the statement he desires to make about it, I am content to let it rest right there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is, of course, content to let it rest, because he has to do that; there must be an end to these things; but the Chair understood his duty to be to enforce that rule, and that is what he did.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, referring a little further to the document from which I was reading when we reached the unfinished business, I quote as follows:

The railroads persist in their effort to throttle water competition, desperately and despite successive reverses, because it is their policy to resist, desperately if need be.

The battle has simply shifted. Now the talk is of honor and of treaty interpretation. But it is the same fight, a little more tense, a little better disguised, because the railroads have been worsted on the open field, and they have learned some lessons from their defeats.

I will say, interpolating here, that as I read that it refers to the railroads as continuing a fight, and that it does not refer—I do not read it as referring—to any Senator, but I agree with the statement as it applies to the railroad interests. Proceeding further, the letter states:

With all the ramifying influences which are always at the service of a great material interest—and the railroads are the largest material interest in the country—the latter are egging on the people to this hysterical surrender of conceded rights, urging us to repent where we have not erred, to relinquish what is clearly ours, and to submit our untarnished honor to self-defamation, for the reason, and for the sole reason, that the long-enjoyed monopoly of the railroads may not be impaired.

BAINBRIDGE COLBY.

Now, Mr. President, I withdraw the offer which I made on yesterday of a certain letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington request unanimous consent to withdraw the letter which he presented on yesterday?

Mr POINDEXTER. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent at this time to withdraw the letter presented by him on yesterday. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of dissenting from the ruling of the Chair yesterday, not that it will affect anything at this time, but for future reference only.

Yesterday the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] presented to the Senate a letter from the chairman of the committee for the preservation of American rights in the Panama Canal, and asked unanimous consent that it be read by the Secretary. The President pro tempore of the Senate made this statement:

The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the letter presented by him may be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. President, after the letter was read there arose a question as to whether it should not be stricken from the RECORD. I shall not take the time of the Senate to rehearse what happened, but simply call attention to the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be well to call attention to the fact that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] made a motion to expunge the letter from the RECORD because it was offensive to a Senator now sitting on the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. That is perfectly true, Mr. President, and that will be a part of the RECORD, which I take it for granted will be examined by all Senators who may refer to the case hereafter. But the President pro tempore made this statement in his ruling:

The Chair will take the responsibility of saying that the document shall not go into the RECORD until the motion is disposed of.

Mr. President, in looking over the RECORD this morning I find that not only is the letter withheld from the RECORD, but I notice that whenever a Senator spoke yesterday and quoted in any way from that letter the quotation has also been excluded from the RECORD. Now, I want simply to say that if that is to be a precedent to be followed hereafter by the Senate, in my opinion it is a most dangerous one, and all I desire at this time is to call the attention of the Senate to it, not for present action but for the RECORD only. As I said in the beginning, it will do no good now in the situation as it has developed, the Senator from Washington having withdrawn the letter by unanimous consent.

I want the Chair to understand that I have not the least feeling in the matter. If I had had an opportunity to vote on the motion made by my colleague, I would have voted for it, but I do believe that the ruling of the Chair yesterday is a most dangerous precedent to establish in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be appropriate at this time for the Chair to say that the ruling made on that occasion was limited to the facts and circumstances of that particular case. Here was a matter challenged as being offensive to a Senator on this floor; the hour of adjournment had arrived; the matter had been inadvertently admitted to the RECORD, and to have permitted the matter to remain in the RECORD and to be printed and sent out as part of the RECORD would have defeated the very object the motion then pending had in view. To preserve the status quo and to give to the Senate the benefit of its action when it should take it, if it did take affirmative action in that behalf, was the purpose that moved the Chair to make that ruling, and nothing short of that, in the opinion of the Chair, would have accomplished that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was fully aware of the purpose of the Chair, and I only want to say to the Chair that the permanent RECORD, if the Senate by vote to-day decided to expunge the letter, would never have included the letter. It would have gone to the country in the RECORD as published this morning, but it would not appear in the permanent RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There may have been various alternative ways in which the same object could have been accomplished, but the Chair preferred to take the one that he took on that occasion.

INSPECTION AND GRADING OF GRAIN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, when this bill was under discussion the other day I called attention to the fact that Mr. Culver, of Toledo, Ohio, president of an association of grain inspectors, a voluntary association, testified that the association had been engaged for a number of years in determining what would be a proper classification of grades of wheat and other cereals. I refer to this matter for the purpose of disabusing Senators of the idea that it is as simple a thing to grade wheat as it is corn. That is, you can not establish two or three grades, as in case of corn, and cover the whole country with it.

This association, after meeting several years, and after discussing the subject for a good many years, finally came to the conclusion that the following classes of grades for wheat were needed. I want to call the attention of the Senators to these grades in order that you may see the variety and number of grades of wheat that are required for the entire country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me for a moment?

Mr. NELSON. For a question. I do not want any argument. I am anxious to get through.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator know of any bill or any proposition that proposes to have one uniform grade that will apply to all the species of grain?

Mr. NELSON. At the risk of being somewhat tedious in the matter, I desire to call attention to the different grades as formulated and proposed by the association of inspectors of which Mr. Culver was president. I read from the exhibit presented to the committee by Mr. Culver:

WHITE WINTER WHEAT.

No. 1 white winter wheat shall include all varieties of pure, soft, white winter wheat, sound, plump, dry, sweet, and clean, and weigh not less than 58 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 2 white winter wheat shall include all varieties of soft, white winter wheat, dry, sound, and clean, and shall not contain more than 8 per cent of soft, red winter wheat, and weigh not less than 56 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 3 white winter wheat shall include all varieties of soft, white winter wheat. It may contain 5 per cent of damaged grains other than skin-burnt wheat, and may contain 10 per cent of soft, red winter wheat, and weigh not less than 53 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 4 white winter wheat shall include all varieties of soft, white winter wheat not fit for a higher grade in consequence of being poor quality, damp, musty, or dirty, and shall not contain more than 10 per cent of soft, red winter wheat and weigh not less than 50 pounds to the measured bushel.

RED WINTER WHEAT.

No. 1 red winter wheat shall be pure, soft, red winter wheat of both light and dark colors, sound, sweet, plump, and well cleaned, and weigh not less than 60 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 2 red winter wheat shall be soft, red winter wheat of both light and dark colors, sound, sweet, and clean, shall not contain more than 5 per cent of white winter wheat, and weigh not less than 58 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 3 red winter wheat shall be sound soft red winter wheat not clean or plump enough for No. 2, shall not contain more than 8 per cent of white winter wheat, and weigh not less than 55 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 4 red winter wheat shall be soft red winter wheat, shall contain not more than 8 per cent of white winter wheat. It may be damp, musty, or dirty, but must be cool and weigh not less than 50 pounds to the measured bushel.

HARD WINTER WHEAT.

No. 1 hard winter wheat shall include all varieties of pure, hard winter wheat, sound, plump, dry, sweet, and well cleaned, and weigh not less than 61 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 2 hard winter wheat shall include all varieties of hard winter wheat of both light and dark colors, dry, sound, sweet, and clean, and weigh not less than 59 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 3 hard winter wheat shall include all varieties of hard winter wheat of both light and dark colors not clean or plump enough for No. 2, and weigh not less than 56 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 4 hard winter wheat shall include all varieties of hard winter wheat of both light and dark colors. It may be damp, musty, or dirty, and weigh not less than 50 pounds to the measured bushel.

Next comes a classification under which the wheat of Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and Canadian wheat would come. It is known as No. 1 northern spring wheat, and is as follows:

NORTHERN SPRING WHEAT.

No. 1 hard spring wheat shall be sound, bright, sweet, clean, and consist of over 50 per cent of the hard Scotch fife, and weigh not less than 58 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 1 northern spring wheat must be northern-grown spring wheat, sound, clean, and of good milling quality, and must contain not less than 50 per cent of the hard varieties of spring wheat, and weigh not less than 57 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 2 northern spring wheat shall be northern-grown spring wheat, not clean enough or sound enough for No. 1, and must contain not less than 50 per cent of the hard varieties of spring wheat, and must weigh not less than 56 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 3 northern spring wheat shall be composed of inferior shrunken northern-grown spring wheat, and weigh not less than 54 pounds to the measured bushel, and must contain not less than 50 per cent of the hard varieties of spring wheat.

No. 4 northern spring wheat shall include all inferior northern-grown spring wheat that is badly shrunken or damaged, and must contain not less than 50 per cent of the hard varieties of spring wheat, and shall weigh not less than 49 pounds to the measured bushel.

SPRING WHEAT.

No. 1 spring wheat shall be sound, plump, and well cleaned, and weigh not less than 59 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 2 spring wheat shall be sound, clean, of a good milling quality, and weigh not less than 57½ pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 3 spring wheat shall include all inferior, shrunken, or dirty spring wheat, and weigh not less than 53 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 4 spring wheat shall include all spring wheat damp, musty, grown, badly bleached, or from any cause which renders it unfit for No. 3, and weigh not less than 49 pounds to the measured bushel.

WHITE SPRING WHEAT.

The grades of Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 white spring wheat shall correspond with the grades of Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 spring wheat, except that they shall be of the white variety.

It appears from this that we have here three kinds of spring wheat, Northern spring wheat with four grades, ordinary spring wheat with four grades, and white spring wheat with four grades. Then we have macaroni or durum wheat, which is in a class by itself. There are four grades of that—No. 1 durum, No. 2, No. 3, and No. 4. In addition to this we have another variety of spring wheat, distinct from durum wheat, which is called velvet chaff, and there are four grades of that, too.

These varieties, durham wheat and velvet chaff, are varieties that have been introduced in recent years. Durum wheat was introduced quite a number of years ago and brought to this country for the purpose of raising crops to advantage in arid or semiarid belts. It was supposed that it could stand the drought better than the ordinary kinds of blue-stem and Scotch fife. The velvet chaff is a later introduction.

When you come to the Pacific coast and mountain sections they make still other grades.

PACIFIC COAST WHEAT.

No. 1 Pacific coast red wheat shall be dry, sound, clean, and free from smut and weigh not less than 59 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 2 Pacific coast red wheat shall be dry, sound, clean, and only slightly tainted with smut and alkali and weigh not less than 58 pounds to the measured bushel.

No. 3 Pacific coast red wheat shall include all other Pacific coast red wheat. It may be smutty or musty, or from any other reason unfit for flouring purposes, and weigh not less than 54 pounds to the measured bushel.

In addition to this, it prescribes another class of Pacific coast wheat termed "Pacific coast white wheat":

Pacific coast white wheat shall be graded according to the rules for Pacific coast red wheat. In case of a mixture of Pacific coast wheat with our home-grown wheat, red or white, such mixture shall be graded "Pacific coast mixed wheat."

The grades of Pacific white and Pacific red wheat are to include all such wheats as are grown in the extreme Northwest and on the Pacific slope from either spring or winter seeding.

Then, they have another grade, which they call mixed wheat:

MIXED WHEAT.

In case of any appreciable mixture of hard and soft wheat, red and white wheat (except as provided in the rule of red winter, white winter, and northern spring wheat), durum, and spring wheat, any of them with each other, it shall be graded according to the quality thereof; and the kind of wheat predominating shall be classed as No. 1, 2, 3, and 4 mixed wheat, and the inspector shall make notation describing its character.

Since this testimony was given before the committee our farmers in the Northwest have introduced still another variety of spring wheat which they call Marquis wheat; and that has 3 or 4 grades, too.

It will be found, then, if we include Marquis wheat with these others, that there are at least 12, if not more, different classes of grades of wheat in the country, and this owing to the variety of our soil and climate, and owing to the fact that our farmers are constantly experimenting to secure new varieties of seed that will fit the climatic conditions and give a better yield.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether wheat deteriorates from being continuously grown on the same soil year after year? In other words, does it "run out," so to speak?

Mr. NELSON. To some extent the farmers seem to be of that opinion. I base the statement upon the fact of their continually changing their seed. When I was a young boy, at my old Wisconsin home, the favorite variety of spring wheat was Canadian club. It was raised for a great many years. By and by the farmers thought it deteriorated, or, to use the expression of the Senator from Georgia, that it "ran out," as it were. Then they took up Scotch fife, and that was the leading crop when I moved to Minnesota in 1871. They had other varieties, but that was considered the best variety; and Scotch fife was a standby for a great many years. By and by, however, the farmers got the impression that they could raise more wheat by getting other varieties; and the next variety that they took up in our country was what they called blue-stem. At first the millers did not consider that equal to the Scotch fife. That is, they did not consider it of as high a quality for milling purposes. In other words, they did not call it hard wheat. After a while, however, after some years, the blue-stem seemed to improve, or the millers seemed to change their minds, and they regarded good blue-stem as equivalent to Scotch fife. Then, by and by, durum or macaroni wheat was introduced, because it was said to be a good yielder and especially because it was understood to stand the drought better than the other varieties of wheat. It became a great favorite in North Dakota, and to some extent in Minnesota and South Dakota. Durum was succeeded by velvet chaff, and this in its turn by marquis wheat.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, right there I should like to ask another question. I do it because I know this is done with cotton and other crops. Do they ever take an equal quantity of two or three different kinds of wheat and sow it, making a hybrid, in order to get an improvement?

Mr. NELSON. I am not aware of that; I have never known farmers to mix different varieties of wheat and sow them together; but I have known farmers to sow oats and wheat together, and they claim that the oats they get in such case is of a better quality, and also the wheat; and where they have the right kind of fanning mills the oats can be readily separated from the wheat. Mr. Culver, in the report from which I have quoted, lays down three general rules:

All wheat, barley, oats, rye, and corn that is in a heated condition, souring, or too damp to be safe for warehousing, or that is badly bin burnt, fire burnt, fire smoked, or badly damaged, mixed with garlic, onions, or containing live weevil, exceedingly dirty, or where different kinds of grain are badly mixed with one another, shall be classed as "sample grade," and the inspector shall make notations as to quality and condition.

The word "new" shall be inserted in each certificate of inspection of a newly-harvested crop of oats until the 15th day of August; of rye, until the 1st day of September; of wheat, until the 1st day of November; and of barley, until the 1st day of November of each year.

And those are the rules laid down for testing the grain.

MANNER OF TESTING GRAIN WITH A TESTING KETTLE.

Place the kettle where it can not be jarred or shaken. Pour from a scoop, bag, or pan, held 2 inches from the top of the kettle, into the middle of the kettle at a moderate speed until running over. Strike off in a zigzag manner with the edge of the beam held horizontally.

Recommended by the Chief Grain Inspectors National Association.

E. H. CULVER, President.

After Mr. Culver had filed this statement as to grades, the following took place before the committee:

The CHAIRMAN. There are how many of those?

Mr. REYNOLDS. There are 30. This list comprises the different markets, agricultural colleges, and institutions of that kind that have adopted the above as their standard of grades. We ask that this be filed.

In other words, 30 institutions, agricultural colleges, and State inspection systems have adopted it.

Senator GRONNA. Did I understand you to say colleges?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Agricultural colleges in the different States that adopted the uniform phraseology.

Senator GRONNA. But none of those—

Here is what Senator GRONNA says:

But none of those are boards of trade.

Mr. CULVER. There are 23 boards of trade, 4 agricultural departments in the different States, and 7 of the national organizations of millers.

And so forth.

And here follows a list of the colleges, State inspection departments, and board-of-trade inspection departments that have adopted these rules for inspection. Among others are the Minnesota grain-inspection department, the Missouri State grain inspection, the Kansas City grain inspection, the Illinois grain inspection. This was away back in 1908 or 1907.

Senator GRONNA then asked this question:

Has it been adopted by the Minneapolis and Duluth Boards of Trade?

Mr. CULVER. Yes, sir; our spring wheat rules, I will say, are identical in all the markets of the United States.

Senator GRONNA. I mean your rules that you have referred to—have they been adopted?

Mr. CULVER. Yes, sir; the spring wheat rules of all the markets in the United States have been longer than any grade of wheat that is in vogue in the grading books, and it is brought about to simplify and to show that the inspection departments of the country are working hard and strenuously, not only with themselves, but with the Agricultural Department. We are furnishing all the data that comes within our power. We are furnishing every facility that we can get to them to simplify this matter of grading of grain so as to lift anything that there is, or any objection there is, to the present system under the exchanges, and, too, the Grain Dealers' National Association.

Senator GRONNA. I want to ask you a few questions. From your statement I can see that you are trying to better the conditions in order to standardize grain or to grade grain. Why are you opposed to the Government doing this or to help you do it?

Mr. Culver replied as follows:

I will answer you just as plainly and just as fairly as I can. Politics and the grain business do not mix in our experience.

Senator GRONNA. Well, that is hardly an answer to my question.

Senator MCCUMBER. That is the reason for this bill, because we do not intend that they shall mix.

Mr. CULVER. Well, Senator McCumber, we have tried strenuously to keep them out in the different States and to keep politics out of the different States and out of the different State departments, but it is almost impossible.

Then further on Senator GRONNA asked this question:

Is it not true that you dock for the wild oats?

Mr. CULVER. No, sir; when we get the wheat—

That refers to other markets besides the Minnesota market—

Mr. CULVER. No, sir; when we get the wheat it is supposed to be furnished by Duluth or Superior by water.

The wheat that is furnished by Duluth and Superior has passed through the elevators and has been cleaned—the oats and foul seed have been taken out of it.

Senator GRONNA. Do you mean the grain that you buy; you buy it without any dockage whatever?

Mr. CULVER. There is no dockage whatever in our shipments of grain by vessels that we get out of Duluth and Superior—it comes on straight.

As I said, those vessels are loaded from the terminal elevators where the wheat has been cleaned and conditioned before it is put into the vessel.

Senator MCCUMBER. There is dockage as it is taken from the car, is there not, in both Duluth and Superior and Minneapolis?

Mr. CULVER. There is dockage in both. There is only one State in the United States that docks grain and that is the State of Minnesota, which is done under their State laws.

Senator MCCUMBER. While they do not dock it, they make allowance in another way, do they not?

Mr. CULVER. I do not know how they could do it. It would be utterly impossible.

The following is the statement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] as it is printed here in the hearings:

Senator MCCUMBER. It will be observed that the Minneapolis markets are, perhaps, for the same kind of grain—Minneapolis and Duluth—the best markets in the United States for a generally higher price for the same kind of grain.

There the Senator from North Dakota for the first time gives the State of Minnesota credit for our system of grain inspection. The truth of it is that the grain market—the cash market of Minneapolis—is the very best grain market in the entire United States. There is no place where the farmer can get so big a price for his grain as at that market. That is largely owing to the fact that Minneapolis is first a great milling center and, in the next place, because we have a thorough and fair system of inspection, and also because our farmers raise a high quality of grain.

If Senators will take the pains to compare the quotations of the different markets—St. Louis, Chicago, Toledo, Buffalo, Milwaukee, or any of those grain markets—with Minneapolis, they will find that the cash price for spring wheat is higher in that market than in any other market in the country.

As I said in my discussion heretofore, we northwestern Senators who were so strongly opposed to Canadian reciprocity when Canadian reciprocity legislation was pending here during the last year of President Taft's administration were glad of the fact that we could quote from 10 to 15 cents per bushel in favor of Minneapolis between the price at Minneapolis and the price at Winnipeg, which meant the price at Port Arthur or Fort William on Lake Superior, for be it known that when wheat reaches Port Arthur or Fort William at the upper end of Lake Superior it is practically as near Buffalo and New York as wheat is in Chicago in the matter of distance, with the same kind of transportation—water transportation. I did not quite finish Senator McCUMBER's statement, and I read further as follows:

Senator McCUMBER. It will be observed that the Minneapolis markets are, perhaps, for the same kind of grain—Minneapolis and Duluth—the best markets in the United States for a generally higher price of the same kind of grain.

Mr. CULVER. For the scarcity of foreign wheat——

Senator McCUMBER. And because they base their price upon the wheat as it should be when it is clean, making their allowance for dockage.

Mr. CULVER. Well, it has only been in the last two years that we have been able to utterly get out the oats from spring wheat, and we have got it to such a small quantity now that we hope in a very short period to complete a machine that will take them all out, and take them out at a reasonable cost. The machine that we have now we can only use in the mills not to exceed from 350 to 450 bushels an hour.

The oats that are referred to here are manifestly wild oats, which have been a great pest in the Northwest. This wild oats came into our wheat some years ago. I never heard from what source it came originally, but it has been one of the worst pests for our wheat. It has affected our wheat in two ways, when thick it lodges the wheat and prevents it from ripening properly. When the growing wheat lodges, it is unable to ripen as does standing grain. Then when you thrash the wheat you have all that quantity of wild oats in the grain, for which dockage is made, and which must be separated from the wheat before it is made into flour.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. WEST. The Senator does not know anything of the oats which grow wild in the South?

Mr. NELSON. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. WEST. There is an oats down there that grows wild, and the stock do not like to eat it. I did not know whether it was that oats that had become incorporated into wheat in the Senator's State or not.

Mr. NELSON. It is not that kind of oats. As to this wild oats with us, the straw grows up something resembling other oats, and is quite tall and the oat itself is a very long, thin, sharp berry. The oats is mixed with other screenings, and is used for hog and cattle feed.

Mr. President, I have been compelled to go into great detail about this matter of grain inspection, more than I would like to have done under ordinary circumstances. I have felt that we have in the State of Minnesota a grain-inspection system second to none in the country. We have been from 28 to 29 years engaged in building up and perfecting that system. We began in 1885 to provide for the regulation of what we call terminal elevators, the elevators at the cities of Minneapolis and Duluth. We placed them under our board of railroad and warehouse commissioners and we established a system of grain inspection for those terminal elevators. The service was divided into two classes of employees, weighers and inspectors. The system worked fairly well. But our farmers complained that they were not justly treated by the local elevators—the country elevators—of which we have a great number. Every railroad station has from one to two, three, or four. We have, perhaps, from 1,500 to 2,000 such elevators in the State. North Dakota has, perhaps, as many. Our farmers felt that the local elevator men did not deal justly with them; did not always give them fair and just weights and fair and just grades, and docked them too much, and oftentimes did not allow them the price they ought to have received for their grain.

We had a good deal of complaint about the local elevator men. They were, as I said the other day, of three classes. There were what we call the line elevators, which belonged to and were appurtenant to the big terminal elevators. A terminal elevator company with two or three big terminal warehouses or elevators for the sake of getting plenty of grain to store and handle and securing the profit out of the storage would build local elevators at different railroad stations and send out buyers who would buy from the farmers and send the grain to these terminal elevators. We call that class of elevators line elevators.

Then we have another class of elevators that we call independent elevators, which are not connected with any terminal elevator. They were usually elevator associations or companies formed by the local merchants and business men in the different towns and villages for the purpose of keeping up the grain market in those localities. These independent elevators buy the wheat from the farmer and ship it to a commission man at Minneapolis or Duluth. Sometimes the commission man advances money to the local elevator for buying the wheat. The commission man sells the wheat by sample on the board of trade or grain exchange and accounts for the proceeds.

Then, we had another class of elevators that have sprung up in Minnesota and, I think, to some extent in North Dakota. We call them farmers' elevators because they are built and operated by associations of farmers. The farmers operate these elevators not so much for the profit of the elevators as to make and keep up a good local market for their grain. These farmers' elevators not only give the farmer the best grade and price they can afford, but also compel the other elevators to keep the same pace in order to do business.

In order to reach and cure the evils complained of in respect to our local elevators, the legislature of Minnesota in 1893 passed what we call the country elevator law or the local elevator law, requiring all country elevators to take out a State license and to be subject to the regulation and control of the railroad and warehouse commission.

Next, in 1899 we went a step further; and in order to further regulate and control this matter of inspection, we established a board of grain appeals consisting of six members appointed by the governor and sitting in two sections, one section of three sitting constantly at Minneapolis, the other section of three at Duluth. Since we have completed our system in the manner indicated there has been little or no complaint among the farmers of Minnesota. Of course there have been cases of reinspection and appeals. I have not had any complaint from the farmers of Minnesota for years, and I think my intimacy and association with the farmers of our State have been of such a character that if they had had any complaint to make they would surely have written me about it; and I have heard none of them advocate national inspection.

So far as I know, there has not been in recent years any serious complaints against our grain-inspection system. The complaint has not been against our grain-inspection service; it has been against the grain exchanges at Minneapolis and Duluth. The complaint comes from certain commission men, who can not get along with the grain exchange, and the complaint of these men is not against the grain-inspection service, but against the board of trade or grain exchange and its methods, a matter not involved in the proposed legislation.

Now, what does this bill propose to do? If the bill becomes a law, it will utterly break up all State inspection systems, whether they are inspection systems established under boards of trade or inspection systems established by the States themselves. There are eight of the great wheat States that have already established good State systems, and in the other States the inspection system has grown up under the various boards of trade, working well, and, on the whole, giving fair satisfaction.

I will now call the attention of the Senate to section 2 of the bill:

That said Secretary shall also appoint, in accordance with the rules of the civil service, at each of the following cities, to wit, Portland, Me.; Boston; New York; Philadelphia; Baltimore; Chicago; Minneapolis; Duluth; Superior; Kansas City, Missouri; Saint Louis; New Orleans; Seattle; Tacoma; and San Francisco; and at such other important centers of interstate trade and commerce in grain as he may consider necessary or proper for carrying out the provisions of this act, one chief grain inspector and such assistants as may be required to inspect and grade grains as herein provided.

There would undoubtedly be a much greater number of inspection points than the cities named should this bill become a law.

These men are to be under the civil service. If you carry out this system it will add from one thousand to fifteen hundred men to our civil service, including the men in the bureau here at Washington, and I do not think that under the civil service you can get as good a lot of men as under the State systems that we now have in force.

If the bill were confined to sections 5, 6, and 7, providing for national standardization, and nothing more, it would be un-objectionable and would accomplish all that is necessary and proper. I call attention to those sections:

SEC. 5. That said Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, as soon as may be after the enactment hereof, to determine and fix, according to such standards as he may provide, such classifications and grading of wheat, flax, corn, rye, oats, barley, and other grains as in his judgment the usages of trade may warrant and permit. In the inauguration of the work herein provided he may, if in his judgment the best interests of trade and commerce in said grains require it, adopt the standards of classification and grades now recognized by commercial usages or established by the laws of any State or by boards of trade or chambers of commerce, and may modify or change such classifications or grades from time to time as in his judgment shall be for the best interests of interstate and export grain trade.

SEC. 6. That when such standards are fixed and the classification and grades determined upon the same shall be made matter of permanent record in the Agricultural Department, and public notice thereof shall be given in such manner as the Secretary shall direct, and thereafter such classification and grades shall be known as the United States standard.

SEC. 7. That from and after 30 days after such classifications and grades have been determined upon and fixed, and duly placed on record as hereinafter provided, such classification and grading shall be taken and held to be the standard in all interstate commerce in grain.

If you take those three sections and limit the bill to them you get national standards for the whole country established by the Federal Government that will be the standards for all interstate commerce. If you stop there you leave the inspection force of each State to live up to those standards. To say that we are not capable in Minnesota or that they are not capable in Missouri or in Illinois to live up to the Federal standards is to say that the employees of the State are not as competent and as honest as they would be if they were Federal employees and wore Uncle Sam's livery.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair.) Will the Senator from Minnesota permit an interruption by the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. I will.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to ask if it is not likely that under this system of Federal inspection competent inspectors now in service under the State systems would be employed under the Federal system?

Mr. NELSON. It is possible the Federal Government might employ them; I do not see how they could get them from any other source; but if they are competent and good employees, why do these men become better men when you put them under Uncle Sam? Why is the man better because he wears Uncle Sam's livery and is in the employ of the Federal Government instead of operating under a State government?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator from South Dakota claim that State officials in South Dakota become better men when they become Federal employees? Now, I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. My question, addressed to the Senator from Minnesota, assumes that there are a great number of competent men now engaged in the State inspection service and that they should be appointed.

Mr. NELSON. Then, why does the Senator want to break up that system?

Mr. STERLING. Because we want a uniform system throughout the country.

Mr. NELSON. You get a uniform system of grades.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Minnesota is referring to the one State of Minnesota, where they now have such an efficient inspection system. We would like to have that efficient system of inspection throughout the whole country. That is why we want Federal inspection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota if the existing system in Missouri, Illinois, and in several of the other States which have such a system, outside of Minnesota, is inefficient?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Illinois, I will state that I am not now saying that they are inefficient, but I think that the State system can be improved, perhaps in several of the States anyway, where they have a State inspection system.

I further think that great advantage will accrue from having a uniform system throughout all the States. As I understand now, there are other States that have the State inspection system like Minnesota, Illinois, Missouri, and two or three other States. Then, there are other States where inspection depends upon the rules of chambers of commerce and boards of trade, and there are different grades because of these different State inspection systems and the fact that there are chambers of commerce and boards of trade in some States under whose supervision inspection is made.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is utterly mistaken in saying that we have different grades because of these different inspection systems. I call attention to the fact that we have different grades because there are different kinds of wheat raised in different parts of the country. That is why we have different grades. In one part of the country they raise a certain quality of winter wheat—red winter wheat; in another part of the country they raise white winter wheat, and in another part they raise hard winter wheat. We have different grades for these different kinds of wheat, not because the systems are not good, but because the crops are different.

I want to ask the Senator another question, though it may be personal. Is the Senator more conscientious, more honest, more trustworthy and reliable, more likely to perform his official duties, more perfect, because he is a United States Senator, instead of being an officer of the State of South Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield further to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am not assuming, of course, that I am more careful of my duties or more diligent in seeking to perform them because I am a United States Senator than I would be if I held some other and some subordinate position in the State of South Dakota; but that is not the question, Mr. President. The question at the bottom of this whole discussion is, as to having a uniform system throughout the whole country, which will be in the interests of the producers of grain.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] if there are any primary markets where the surplus grain from a State is not consumed for domestic purposes inside of that State? Aside from the eight inspection States, that produce 95 per cent of our grain, are there any markets outside of those States that have inspection systems?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am not quite able to answer that question. I think it is not probable that there are many such, or, if there are any, there are not many primary markets outside of the States that have a grain-inspection system. Still, that does not go to the question. If those States are the only States that have the great terminal markets they vary more or less, our contention is, in their system of inspection and grading of grain.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me make a further inquiry, Mr. President, of the Senator as to whether there is any difference in the grades of northern spring wheat in the United States at the present time?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, in answer to that I will say there is a difference in northern spring wheat, and we have different grades; we have No. 1 northern, No. 2 northern, and No. 3 northern. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator did not understand the question quite widely enough as I aimed to convey it. Is there any difference in the grading of northern spring wheat in different points in the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to answer that question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say that, unless there has been a change in the last one or two years, there has been a difference in all of them; and if it has been changed it is a change that is not fixed by law, and can be changed back again. When the testimony was taken which I have here there were no two of them which graded the same, though it was wheat raised at the same point in the same way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say further, then, that the northern spring wheat is graded at Minneapolis and Duluth or at Superior, in Wisconsin, and the grades are adjusted to the character of wheat that is milled in that part of the country. There is no grading of northern spring wheat in Kansas City, because we do not raise it in that portion of the country. It comes down from their portion of the country to Chicago.

Mr. NELSON. Nor do you have it in Chicago.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I beg to differ with Senators. I do not think any North Dakota or South Dakota wheat is shipped to Chicago the same as at Minneapolis, but you do get the same grades.

Mr. NELSON. You do not have the same grades in Chicago of No. 1 hard wheat, as I understand.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, all this simply corroborates what the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] said in regard to the points to which wheat from the Dakotas is shipped. I know very well that considerable wheat from South Dakota goes to Chicago.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to inquire what is the difference in grade between the small portion of the northern wheat that goes to Chicago and that which goes to Minneapolis and Duluth?

Mr. STERLING. If the question is addressed to me, I will say that I am unable to state now, but I think it quite well established by the evidence taken at the hearings before the Senate and House committees that there is a difference in the grading between Chicago and Minneapolis and a difference in the grading between Chicago and Kansas City of the same kind of wheat.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator know why? It is because most of the wheat in Kansas City is winter wheat, or it is a hard variety of spring wheat; it is different. The spring wheat tributary to Chicago, raised in northern Illinois, in Iowa, and in Wisconsin is a softer variety of spring wheat than that raised in North Dakota, in Minnesota, and in the Canadian Provinces.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Minnesota suggests the question as to whether I do not know how that difference in grading comes about.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator not know that it is a fact?

Mr. STERLING. I think the fact exists in regard to the difference in grading and the different qualities of wheat, but, Mr. President, if we had one uniform system of inspection there would not be that difference and No. 1 northern would grade No. 1 northern in any place.

Mr. NELSON. Could the Senator get a uniform quality for all these varieties of wheat?

Mr. STERLING. If it graded No. 1 northern or No. 2 northern at Minneapolis or at Chicago, it would grade No. 1 or No. 2 northern at St. Louis or Kansas City.

Mr. NELSON. There is none of it marketed at those places.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator from South Dakota was speaking of the same kind and quality of wheat raised at the same place; for instance, if one carload of wheat raised upon a farm in South Dakota is shipped to Minneapolis and another carload of the same wheat is shipped to Chicago, they both ought to be graded the same under the same system.

Mr. NELSON. Well, they do not.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from South Dakota was speaking of the identical grain.

Mr. NELSON. They do not, because in Chicago they do not have the No. 1 hard grade, and they never have had it, as I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. They have their grades of this northern wheat. Their contract grades are always of the red variety, and upon what are known as the contract grades they have the same grades. I have, although it is not at hand at this moment, data concerning that matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if there are any grades known in the Minneapolis or in the Duluth market as northern spring wheat, they are sold in those grades at those points.

Mr. NELSON. Of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have no No. 1 or No. 2 northern spring wheat in Chicago. That grade is taken entirely from the system of inspection in Minnesota or in whatever area northern spring wheat will grow. There is no such grade in Chicago.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, when our Minnesota wheat that is graded No. 1 northern comes to Chicago it is sold as No. 1 northern.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. And not according to the Chicago grade.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say further in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. STERLING) that whenever grain is graded it is at the primary market in the area of production. The National Association of Grain Inspectors, from whose report the Senator from Minnesota has read, have provided in substance in documentary form for the grades of grain that fit the different areas of production throughout the United States. I wish to state to both the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from South Dakota that if the bill proposed here should be enacted into law it would only adopt what is now being done by every one of the inspection systems found in the eight primary markets of the United States. The grades fixed by these inspection systems correspond to the grain produced in those areas of production. The men in Minneapolis who understand grading grain there, in that area of northern spring wheat, as it is known, could not grade the Oklahoma or Kansas product, which is a different production altogether. They are skilled in that line; each one of them belongs to his own locality; and if United States authority took over that inspection system it would not change a particle any of these grades; it would only adopt the grades which have been developed through a long series of years, as is the case in Minnesota.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois, if that is true, who is to grade the Canadian grain that comes in? What standard of quality is to be imposed upon that grain, and by whom?

Mr. NELSON. The standard of the place where it is sold.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I desire to know, whether it is graded at the point of destination or elsewhere.

Mr. NELSON. If the Canadian grain is shipped to Minneapolis or Duluth it is graded like any other wheat that comes by rail to those points. Most of the Canadian wheat that is shipped is shipped in bond. The Canadian railroads have not been able always to take care of the crop and they ship some of it through our country on the Canadian Northern in bond. It comes down to Duluth, being shipped in bond, especially during the winter season when navigation is closed. Of course, when it gets east, it depends on where the wheat goes. If it goes through in bond and is shipped to England or to other countries in Europe, it goes through on the Canadian inspection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On the Canadian certificate.

Mr. NELSON. In England they buy by sample; they do not buy the wheat as we do here. They have no grain exchanges there, such as we have in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, a national law would confer no additional safeguard or power in the inspection of foreign grain that is not now enjoyed under the State law?

Mr. NELSON. No. The Canadian wheat and Minnesota wheat, known as Duluth wheat, are well known in Europe. They are accepted there as of a higher and more valuable grade than other kinds of wheat. The Winnipeg grades and the Duluth grades are well known in London and in Liverpool, and that wheat commands a higher price than other spring wheat.

But I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under no State system of which I know, either where it is conducted by the State or through boards of trade, is it compulsory. In Minnesota, under our system, my grain can be shipped from Alexandria, where I live, to Minneapolis or Duluth or to any other point within or without the State without being inspected by the State at all; but under this bill, the Senator from South Dakota could not ship a bushel of grain from his State into another State, to a mill in Iowa, for instance, or to a mill in Minnesota or to a mill in Illinois without Federal inspection; he could not ship a carload of grain of his own without having it inspected by the Federal authorities. This bill makes such inspection absolutely compulsory. I want to call the attention of the Senator to its language.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator to wait until I finish my statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. The bill contains no such provision.

Mr. NELSON. I will first read section 8, and in connection with that I will read other sections:

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of any railroad company, steamship company, or other firm or corporation or private individual engaged in the transportation of grain destined to any State, Territory, or country other than that in which it is received for inspection, or received from any other State, Territory, or country than that to which it is consigned, to notify the chief grain inspector at the place of destination of any consignment of grain, within 24 hours after its arrival, that a shipment, cargo, or load of grain is in its, theirs, or his hands and the place of destination of said grain.

But note this language:

That it shall be unlawful for any person herein named to willfully unload or otherwise discharge any load, cargo, or consignment of grain which has been at any time during the period of its transit an article of interstate commerce and which has not been inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act, until the same has been inspected as provided herein.

In other words, if I ship wheat by rail from Minnesota to another State, whereby it becomes an "article of interstate commerce," it can not be unloaded until it has been inspected by Federal officials. In other words, the wheat is held up till there has been such inspection.

Now I will read the next section, which illustrates still further my contention:

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of said inspectors to inspect and grade all grain * * * which at the time of inspecting and grading of the same has been shipped from any other State, Territory, or country than the State, Territory, or country in which the same is inspected, or is intended for shipment into any other State, Territory, or foreign country before the same is unloaded from the car, vessel, or other vehicle in which the same was or is being transported.

In other words, all grain has got to be inspected; no man can ship grain from one State into another in interstate commerce without having it inspected by the national inspectors before unloaded from the cars. If I ship a carload of wheat from my home at Alexandria to Minneapolis, Chicago, Buffalo, Toledo, Cleveland, New York, or Boston it is the duty of the railroad company to notify the inspection department; and that wheat can not be unloaded and delivered from the car until it is inspected. The bill in this respect imposes a complete embargo on interstate commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, that is a most interesting statement.

Mr. NELSON. I ask Senators to read the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very much impressed with it; and it recalls to my mind the argument that was made in favor of the denatured alcohol industry, where we required an inspector to be right on hand before any denatured alcohol could be perfected. The result was that there were not inspectors enough, and the industry languished because of a lack of supervision which the law imposed upon the industry.

Mr. NELSON. And the denatured alcohol law, which everybody supposed was to be such a great help to the country, turned out to be what might be called in common parlance practically a "fizzle," did it not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It was a failure, in my judgment, because the machinery with which to put it in motion was not available at the places of production. They could not have the inspectors running in all directions; they could not go over counties and States in droves in order to ascertain who was producing denatured alcohol.

Mr. NELSON. Did not that enlarge the civil service? Is it not true that the more employees you get in the civil service the better for the service? If you get a couple of thousand more men in the civil service, would not that be a great advantage to the service?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not very fond of the civil service, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota. I think we have got altogether too much of it now.

Mr. NELSON. The inspection service is put under the civil-service law by this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By and by the civil service will run the Government entirely, if we keep on.

Mr. NELSON. I will read these sections again; they are very drastic and binding when you take them together.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of any railroad company, steamship company, or other firm or corporation or private individual engaged in the transportation of grain destined to any State, Territory, or country other than that in which it is received for inspection, or received from any other State, Territory, or country than that to which it is consigned, to notify the chief grain inspector at the place of destination of any consignment of grain, within 24 hours after its arrival, that a shipment, cargo, or load of grain is in its, their, or his hands and the place of destination of said grain.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. I will ask the Senator to wait until I get through; then he can ask me any question he desires. Section 8 continues:

That it shall be unlawful for any person herein named to willfully unload or otherwise discharge any load, cargo, or consignment of grain which has been at any time during the period of its transit an article of interstate commerce and which has not been inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act, until the same has been inspected as provided herein.

If you read that in connection with section 9, you will see that it puts an embargo on all grain that is shipped from one State into another State.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. I will ask the Senator to wait until I quote section 9. I read from section 9 as follows:

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of said inspectors to inspect and grade all grains which at the time of inspecting and grading of the same has been shipped from any other State, Territory, or country than the State, Territory, or country in which the same is inspected, or is intended for shipment into any other State, Territory, or foreign country before the same is unloaded from the car, vessel, or other vehicle in which the same was or is being transported.

In this connection I call your attention to part of section 13, which reads as follows:

SEC. 13. That the shipment or consignment of any grain aforesaid from any of the places mentioned herein to another State or foreign country without the same being inspected and graded as herein provided is hereby prohibited.

In other words, it actually prohibits the shipment of grain from one State into another State unless it has been inspected. It is an absolute veto—a prohibition.

In connection with that provision I read section 15, a penal section, which is as follows:

SEC. 15. That any person or corporation who willfully does any act prohibited herein or who willfully refuses or neglects to do or perform the things required of him under the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in a sum not to exceed $5,000.

This bill, then, requires that the railroad over which the grain is shipped must notify the inspector at the place of destination, within 24 hours after arrival, of the fact that it is carrying certain grain, and the railroad is forbidden to unload the grain at the point of destination unless the grain has been first inspected; and the shipment of grain from any of the places mentioned in the bill to another State or foreign country without its being inspected and graded as provided in the bill is prohibited.

In other words, Mr. President, if you take this bill in its entirety you find that it is absolutely compulsory and prohibitory. It puts interstate trade in grain into a legislative strait-jacket. No matter how good my grain may be, if I ship that grain to a point outside of my own State for sale, to any point where there is inspection, the railroad company has no right to unload it from the car until it has been inspected; I have no right to sell it until it has been inspected; and if I do, I am violating the law and am subject to a heavy penalty.

There is no compulsion in any of the State systems, so far as I know. There is none in Minnesota, none in the State of Illinois, none in the State of Missouri, I understand. I do not know of a single State where there is anything compulsory about it, or anything forbidding the shipment of grain without inspection. It so happens that most of the grain that is shipped to Duluth from interior points in Minnesota has to go through a small corner of Wisconsin to get to the terminal at Duluth, and that immediately makes it an article of interstate commerce. Under this proposed Federal law I can not ship any wheat to Duluth or Superior unless there is Federal inspection of it. If I violate the law, I am subject to a penalty. If the railroad company unloads it without inspection, it is subject to a penalty.

In other words, the railroad carrier is forbidden to deliver the grain out of the car until it has been inspected, and the penalty clause would apply not only to the owner of the grain who failed to have it inspected, but to the railroad company. It would apply also to the mill or elevator which received it without inspection.

But, in any event, inspection at the terminal points would not give the farmers much relief. When the wheat reaches those terminal points—Minneapolis, Duluth, Chicago, Superior, Kansas City, or St. Louis—it is no longer the wheat of the farmer. The farmer disposes of his wheat at the local elevator. When he arrives at the local elevator with his load of wheat he either sells the wheat or stores it, and he is in either case to a large extent at the mercy of the local elevator men. This bill makes no provision for the regulation of the local elevators. Unless the farmer is accorded fair and honest treatment at his local elevator, he does not get much help from terminal inspection. Terminal inspection benefits the middleman, the dealer, rather than the farmer. The chief complaint of the North Dakota farmers is against their local elevators. They have suffered more from the exactions of these than from any other cause.

I am opposed to this plan of grain inspection. I am opposed to it because, as I have shown, it is in its essence arbitrary, compulsory, and prohibitory. It makes it mandatory to inspect and grade wheat shipped in interstate commerce whether such inspection is desired or not. I am opposed to it because it would tend to destroy and break up the good State inspection systems that are now efficient and giving satisfaction. I am opposed to it because it affords the farmer no protection against the local elevator man. Our Minnesota system is a good system. Under it the markets at Minneapolis and Duluth are the best in the entire country. So far as prices are concerned, the cash markets for spring wheat at Duluth and Minneapolis are ahead of all the other cash markets in the country, and have been for many years. For many years our market has been better than the market at Chicago. The Duluth wheat, like the Winnipeg wheat, has a high reputation abroad. That reputation it has acquired under our system of State inspection. By adopting a national system you would destroy that reputation, and I venture to predict that if a system is adopted such as is provided in this bill the farmers of Minnesota would get from 5 to 10 cents a bushel less than they are getting now or would get under our State system.

I concede that the Senator from North Dakota is acting in the utmost good faith. I do not want him for a moment to understand that I am criticising his motives. We are all subject to our environment and surroundings, and to the claims of our constituents. I think, however, that when we come to consider this question calmly, when we divorce it from the pressure that oftentimes is put on us by political farmers, and put the case on its merits, we will come to the conclusion that this proposed legislation will not bring relief. What the farmers of North Dakota need most of all is a strict regulation of their local elevators. They need protection against the exactions of those elevators. If full protection were given them in this behalf, there would be little fault found with terminal inspection.

It is a most gratifying matter that I have not had for many years any complaint from any source in Minnesota against our grain inspection. I have never during this session of Congress had a letter favoring this legislation, and no one has written to me to oppose it. No one has urged me to support it. I have not heard a word from our own grain-inspection service in Minnesota on the subject. I was obliged to write to them in order to have them send me the pamphlets from which I have quoted. They did not even send them to me until I wrote for them. There is no pressure from the chambers of commerce. I am simply acting in this matter on my own judgment, based on my own experience and knowledge, the knowledge I acquired as a farmer, the knowledge I acquired when I was the head of our State government and had something to do with our State grain-inspection service.

It is for the reasons I have given and not because of any pressure from any source that I am opposing this bill. I am opposing it because I believe it is intrinsically a bad bill, a bill that will put the grain service of this country in a strait-jacket, that will be hurtful in the long run to the farmers and producers of this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to and have made a note of every important statement made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], for the purpose of answering it in due time, after the arguments upon the other side have been closed. I shall do that after other speakers have answered my first address.

At this time I wish to pause only long enough to correct an error the Senator from Minnesota ought to have seen when he read the bill and made his assertion that under its terms it would be necessary to inspect every load of grain that passed across a State border. The whole bill shows that that was not its intent and that it could not possibly be so construed. I have argued over and over again that that was not the purpose of the bill.

Section 8, of which the Senator complains, provided for the duty of inspection, and the duty to notify the chief grain inspector at the place of destination of the arrival of any consignment of grain within 24 hours. It provided where the chief inspector should be located, and that a consignment of grain arriving at that particular great terminal place should receive an inspection. Others have thought, however, upon reading the bill, the same as the Senator from Minnesota claimed, that it was not sufficiently explicit. To make absolutely clear the intent and purpose of the bill, therefore, I offered as an amendment the following, and had the bill printed with that proposed amendment:

Where an inspector is located at such place.

Section 9, as the bill was introduced, read:

That it shall be the duty of said inspectors to inspect and grade all grain which at the time of inspecting and grading of the same has been shipped from any other State—

And so forth.

While that applies only to the great terminals, to make it absolutely certain and beyond question I have asked to amend the bill by inserting these words:

Arriving or collected at any of the aforesaid grain centers and.

So, whatever criticism may have been aimed at the bill in respect to the requirement of inspection at any other place, and its not being certain on that point, I wish to say that it was so intended; and to make it doubly certain that it should not apply to any other place I have offered those amendments.

I only wish to say in addition, at this time, concerning the complaint made by the Senator as to the notification and the unloading, that before drafting the bill I examined the systems in many of the States in reference to requiring notice to be given and in reference to the unloading. I regarded that in the State of Minnesota as the best, and I therefore followed the Minnesota law word for word in reference to the notification and the unloading of grain and its inspection before it could be unloaded. That is the Minnesota law, which the Senator has stated is such a good law.

I think, Mr. President, if we will all give the bill our serious attention, in order to reach just the things that we want to correct, and will be perfectly fair in the discussion, we will not be very far apart in the end.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 27, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 25, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we find ourselves involved in a grave and complicated problem which must be solved in the light of advancing civilization and in the interests of peace, hence we seek Thy favor that we may be guided by the light of heaven and quit ourselves like men. "With malice toward none and charity for all," in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LOAN OF EQUIPMENT TO AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for immediate consideration House joint resolution 242, authorizing the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to loan equipment for the purpose of instruction and training, to sanitary organizations of the American National Red Cross.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us have it read.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let us have the resolution reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be, and are hereby, authorized to issue, each at his discretion and under proper regulations to be prescribed by him, out of equipment for medical and other establishments on hand, belonging to the Government and which can be temporarily spared, such articles as may appear to be required for instruction and practice by organizations formed by the American National Red Cross, for the purpose of rendering aid to the Army and Navy in war.

SEC. 2. That the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War or by the Secretary of the Navy, in pursuance of the authority granted by section 1, shall provide for the immediate return of the articles of equipment loaned the American National Red Cross when called for by the authority which issued them; and the said Secretaries shall require a bond in each case, in double the value of the property, for the care and safe-keeping thereof and for the return of the same when required.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, from what committee does this come?

Mr. AVIS. From the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAY. It comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. HAY. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in the second section provision is made for a bond to be given in double the amount of the value of the articles that may be loaned to the Red Cross. I assume from that provision that the society will give that bond, and are in a position to give the bond, for the return of these various articles.

Mr. AVIS. I assume that unless it gives such bond as is required by the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy, respectively, it can not get them. The equipment to be loaned is for temporary use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that a mere agreement on the part of the American Society of the National Red Cross for the return of these articles will be sufficient, without putting them to the expense of giving bond in double the value of the articles furnished to them?

Mr. AVIS. I will say to the gentleman that the American National Red Cross is willing to give the bond.

Mr. STAFFORD. If they are willing and in a position to do so, I have no objection. I thought perhaps it might be a hardship on the society to give a bond in double the value.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman know the value of these articles that will be loaned?

Mr. AVIS. No. The resolution provides merely for the loaning and use of the equipment and articles that the Army and Navy have, in order that the Red Cross volunteers may familiarize themselves with the use of such equipment and articles in time of war or threatened war.

Mr. MURDOCK. The equipment is not very expensive, is it?

Mr. AVIS. Oh, no; ambulances, litters, and other equipment that will instruct the Red Cross members in the use of such equipment and how to care for the sick and wounded, to remove the wounded and sick from the field, to transport them, and to do the other sanitary work which they may be called upon to do in the performance of their duties in time of war. The equipment desired is such as the Navy and Army have at their disposal.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, this is called up as an emergency matter.

Mr. AVIS. It is called up at this time as an emergency matter.

Mr. MANN. Because of our present situation?

Mr. AVIS. Because of the present situation, and because of the fact that a large number of men and women are now volunteering for the work of the Red Cross. They are enrolled for this service for specified terms, just as men are enlisted in the Army and Navy; and in order to train them for the sanitary and other service, which they may be called upon to render immediately, in the field, in hospitals, and on the hospital ships, the immediate use of this equipment is desired by the committee in charge of the work.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. AVIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 11269) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war. I ask that the report be read. It is brief.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 576).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11269) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 12, 13, 14, 20, 21, 29, 30, 38, and 41.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 4½, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 15, 16, 17, 19, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 40, 42, and 43, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$40"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOE J. RUSSELL,
J. A. M. ADAIR,
J. N. LANGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

THOMAS STERLING,
BENJ. F. SHIVELY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RUSSELL. I move that the conference report be agreed to.

The conference report was agreed to.

NAVAL STATION AT NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution 253 reappropriating funds for expenditure at the naval station at New Orleans, La., with a Senate amendment to the title, and I move that the House agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up House joint resolution 253, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. J. Res. 253. Joint resolution reappropriating funds for expenditure at the naval station at New Orleans, La.

With a Senate amendment amending the title so as to read: "A joint resolution reappropriating certain funds for expenditure at the naval station at New Orleans, La."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution appropriates the unobligated and unexpended balances of certain appropriations made since July 1, 1904. Two years ago Congress passed a law which covered into the Treasury all unexpended and unobligated balances that were being carried to the credit of certain appropriations made prior to 1904. This resolution reappropriates, to be expended for any purpose, all the unobligated and unexpended balances since that date for the New Orleans Navy Yard. It seems to me that, under the situation which exists to-day, whatever money is required by the various departments to carry on military operations can be had very readily if the departments comply with the law and submit estimates to Congress for its consideration. I believe that it is not wise simply upon the communication of the department to a Member of the House to pass legislation of this character. I propose to object to such resolutions in the future.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. This matter was up yesterday. Here is an unexpended balance amounting to $234,000, and I want to know where the money that is unexpended is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is all in the Treasury.

Mr. MURDOCK. And not in the hands of any disbursing officer?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; it is a paper account. The sum of $10,000 was appropriated down there for fencing the grounds, and it took less than $3,000 to do it. The money has never been drawn out of the Treasury, and it is an illusion to imagine that we are not by this resolution appropriating money, because we are.

Mr. MURDOCK. When are the unexpended balances covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Except in the case of appropriations which are permanent appropriations, or made available until used, all appropriations are covered back into the Treasury within two years after the end of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. This is the dream of some one in the department that because certain sums are appropriated and not all used no money is appropriated by reappropriating the unexpended balances.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from New York thinks this is bad practice?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not only bad but indefensible and ought not to be done. If the Navy Department needs any money for these yards, it ought to estimate for them and ask for it; then we will have some way of keeping track of what this situation is going to cost us in money.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has passed the House and the Senate, and this is simply a question of amending the title.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to agree to the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendment was agreed to was laid on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] to use his 10 minutes that he reserved.

Mr. BUTLER. I reserved 12 minutes; the balance I yielded to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How much time, Mr. Chairman, remains for general debate?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand about an hour and thirty-eight minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Altogether?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and fifty-one minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How is that time controlled?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBERTS] has 40 minutes, the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS] has 38 minutes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] 33 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to the allotment of homes and farms and other valuable things which the gentlemen who represent the small-Navy side on this question would give to the American people with the money the Government spends to develop and maintain our Navy; but I have not heard one of them intimate how many homes or farms could be given to the people, did we have the vast wealth represented in the great cost of wars that have occurred because of our lack of preparation.

During the history of this country from 1775 to the present time, more than 50 years of that period have been taken up in warfare. Authorities contend that, had we been properly prepared on the sea, the War of 1812 would not have taken place, and the war with France, that with Tripoli, and one or two other belligerent affairs which we have engaged in would not have taken place. Even the Civil War could have been averted; if not prevented, authorities agree that it would have been limited to a six months' conflict, by blockades of the seaboards of the South, which we could not do because of lack of ships. That war, including the public debt incurred, when the last pension shall have been paid, will have cost this country $10,000,000,000, without counting the tremendous cost of property destroyed.

I am pleased to say, Mr. Chairman, that my constituency is in favor of a strong Navy—one that conforms not only to the present needs, but with thought for the future, and the twists and turns of history, accentuated by the present intense and great rivalry among the nations.

That feeling indicates their intelligence and practical, patriotic view on this question. It is the humane view. They do not want war.

It is the masses that furnish the fighting, protecting forces of the Nation. They come from the mine, the mill, the factory, and the business places. They are the rank and file of the people. Do you suppose the mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, and sweethearts and wives of the splendid young men now risking their lives for their country are quarreling with the Nation for the expenditures that give better facilities and greater safety to their dear ones? The American people want the best in naval advantages, and they are willing to pay for them. Never before in our history was there a greater need of a powerful Navy. Every indication points to such a necessity. More and more the Monroe doctrine is pressing its responsibility. It has led to the present Mexican complications. We are now in a war with Mexico that will likely continue for several years. As the South American Republics develop their great resources and foreign nations struggle for trade there this doctrine grows in acuteness and adds to American responsibilities. Shall we maintain the doctrine? Dare we abandon it? Can you realize the trouble, turmoil, and tragic history that would follow our surrender of this policy? Who shall judge of the requirements of the Navy? The men who have given their lives to the naval service of the country, who have knowledge of every need, who know the progress of naval improvement—able men, patriotic citizens, courageous men, with love of country permeating heart and mind; the men who know how to use battleships and other instruments of naval warfare and are capable of giving us sound advice and are conscientious enough to give us honest advice.

I would rather be responsible for building one more ship than is necessary than one less than we need, with the increased danger to our fighting heroes and greater death losses.

The Representatives in Congress who were responsible for the no Navy or the weak Navy of our past history carried with them to their graves a tremendous responsibility in the loss of life and cost in treasure.

Unpreparedness in the past has been the most costly part of American military history. Admiral Vreeland, in answer to a question asked by me at a meeting of the Committee on Naval Affairs, said that five American wars could have been averted if we had had adequate naval facilities. He afterwards modified this statement by saying it would apply to four wars and to the shortening of the Civil War. It is difficult to conceive of the significance of a statement like this. Nearly 800,000 people lost their lives in that dreadful conflict.

Thanks to the good sense and patriotism of our people and the energy and determination of their Representatives in Congress, we now have the best-equipped Navy in our history, and it is our duty, in the interest of peace and protection, to maintain a high standard and be equipped for any emergency.

As sad and distracting and terrible as are the conditions of war, nothing more comforted our people than the statement "we are ready" by Admiral Badger on his way to the Mexican waters. I sincerely wish that we were as well equipped at Vera Cruz with land forces as we are with those of the sea. The sooner we mass large military forces there the more certain the safety of our brave men, the quicker the results, the less loss of life, and the more complete the settlement of the Mexican trouble. The valor of the bluejackets and marines under the leadership of their capable and intrepid officers at Vera Cruz command the admiration of the American people. We know they will undergo every sacrifice to do their duty; but are they protected against the possible onslaught of overwhelming numbers?

What a splendid object lesson do the naval forces at Vera Cruz afford as to the need and importance of this mighty fighting arm.

Yet as comparatively well equipped as is the Navy to-day, we shall have to charter many ships to convey food supplies, munitions of war, and so forth, to our troops.

We need many colliers to carry the fuel for our ships.

Who would desire a repetition of the humiliation we felt when our fleet went around the world to learn that our Government was compelled to charter 49 colliers at a cost of a million dollars?

The Solace is the only hospital ship we have. I fear we shall require more.

Nobody wants war. It is too awful in its consequence to home and country. But peace is as yet a theory. As much as we desire harmony among nations, conditions point to war. Permanent peace throughout the world requires the elimination of the human element. Until the day of perfection, misunderstandings, disagreements will arise among nations as well as among individuals, and will result in trouble. As costly as battleships are, they are more humane and cheaper than battles. The man able to defend himself has less occasion to use his physical power. The better prepared a nation, the fewer conflicts it has. Germany's long peace in fighting trim is evidence of that fact.

The menace of Japan is due to the fact that she demonstrated fighting ability. She was prepared, and she defeated China. She was prepared, and she conquered Russia. It was after these victories that Japan loomed up as a world figure, and it is her ability to fight that makes that nation a possible menace to us on the Pacific coast. No one who knows human nature and who has followed the teachings of history believes that the California discrimination against that people is a closed incident. The unfriendliness of Japan's newspapers in this crucial period indicates that.

I shall vote with pleasure for the committee's bill and with particular satisfaction for the two dreadnaughts. [Applause.]

I append the following statement of the wars waged by the United States and the warship tonnage of the principal naval powers:

[1] Battleships having a main battery of all big guns. (11 inches or more in caliber.)
[2] Battleships of (about) 10,000 or more tons displacement, whose main batteries are of more than 1 caliber.
[3] Includes smaller battleships and monitors.
[4] Armored cruisers having guns of largest caliber in main battery and capable of taking their place in line of battle with the battleships. They have an increase of speed at the expense of carrying fewer guns in main battery and a decrease in armor protection.
[5] All unarmored warships of more than 1,500 tons are classed as cruisers. Scouts are considered as cruisers in which battery and protection have been sacrificed to secure extreme speed. The word "protected" has been omitted because all cruisers except the smallest and oldest now have protective decks.
[6] Colonial vessels included.
[7] Includes 4 submarines authorized in 1913, contracts for which will not be awarded until latter part of December, 1913.

The following vessels are not included in the tables: Ships over 20 years old from date of launch, unless they have been reconstructed and rearmed within 5 years. Torpedo craft over 15 years old. Those not actually begun or ordered, although authorized. Transports, colliers, repair ships, torpedo depot ships, or other auxiliaries. Vessels of less than 1,500 tons, except torpedo craft. Torpedo craft of less than 50 tons. Vessels undergoing trials are considered as completed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that on this side we have remaining 32 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield that time to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I will now ask the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS] to use some of his time.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, we find ourselves in a situation in the Gulf of Mexico that brings clearly to our minds that in our much-vaunted civilization force is still the final arbitrament of our national troubles. We may have dreamed of universal peace and thought that we saw in immediate prospect the settlement of our troubles in a parliament of the world, but we still find that when our difficulties are brought immediately home to us we are obliged by the condition of our present civilization still to settle them by brute force. We little thought a month ago that our Nation would be in the situation we find it in this morning, and that situation has come, too, when we have, as our Chief Executive and as his chief adviser, two men who, I believe, have as thorough distaste of war as any men you could find in the world. It simply shows that however willing men may be to avoid difficulties of this kind, events and conditions of civilization are greater than men themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I am greatly concerned about this condition, as we all are, but I am not so greatly concerned about it as I am about our own internal affairs, and I believe that it is not of as great concern to the Nation, serious as it is, as is the condition of these internal matters. I do not presume academically to inform this House or the Members thereof, but we learn by bitter experience, and I have personally gone through an experience in the past few months that has taught me something in regard to our domestic situation which I believe is worthy of earnest consideration. We have had in my home district, and we are having to-day in the State of Colorado, and have had in the State of West Virginia, situations that are of far more dangerous portent to the people of this country than is the possible war with Mexico. They are more dangerous, because they involve the very life of the institutions upon which this country has been founded.

I listened the other day to the eloquent gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] detail how the wars of this country had been fought for the most part to sustain principle. I believe that is true. I am proud to believe that it is true—that we have fought our wars to sustain principle rather than for mere selfish reasons of conquest. If we are going to preserve ourselves, we must turn our attention to the difficulties involving vital principles that confront us in our affairs at home. Conditions are changing. Not very many years ago the large, selfish, special-privileged interests of this country were satisfied to obtain what they could and to maintain what they had by their dominant control of the peaceful forces of society, the press, and those whom they could influence and control politically.

As these forces began to weaken and began to lose their control politically, as is shown by conditions in many places in this country to-day, those directing the activities of intrenched special privilege have actually turned to the idea of maintaining their position by arms in the hands of paid mercenaries who turn their guns upon our people. The conditions in my district, in Colorado, and in West Virginia are all the same. On one side you will find the owners of great industrial property insisting upon absolute autocratic control of their property. They say, "It is ours. We will brook no interference from any official of the State or National Government, no matter how high, nor from any other source. It is ours; it is our pocketbook. We will do as we please with it." Under cover of this statement they import an army, a private army. They arm them, and they turn them over ostensibly to guard what they say is theirs, their property, but as a matter of fact they go further, and this is the danger. They are not even satisfied to rest upon that proposition, which in the case of large national-resource industry is not a fair statement, because it is not theirs alone, but it belongs not only to the private owners, but it belongs to the public who is interested in it as well. But they go further than that, and in every one of these cataclysms, every one of these breakdowns of society in these States where this thing occurs, you will find that these men who use these forces have not been content to protect what they claim to be their property, but they have used their armed forces for the committing of brutal outrages and in many cases murder upon our citizens for the purpose of driving those citizens back to work and not for the purpose of protecting their property.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not fair, in connection with what the gentleman has said, to say that there are establishments in the United States which furnish for hire armed men to commit violence?

Mr. MACDONALD. I think that the records of West Virginia——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the committee is in fairly good order.

Mr. MURDOCK. There has not been order; there have been repeated interruptions.

Mr. PAYNE. Who is presiding here?

Mr. MURDOCK. We have a right to have order, and I do not think we have had it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the records of West Virginia, of Colorado, and of the Michigan strike situation will show that the statement involved in the question of the gentleman from Kansas is true. Strange as it may seem the absolute sworn testimony in many of these investigations shows that there are organizations of such a class of men, mercenary, so-called guards, in this country, who have been willing to do anything that their employers might want them to do, and they are even willing to boast that their instructions before they reach the ground are to do those very things.

Now, the conditions surrounding these places are bad enough; we all know that; there is no argument about it, but the thing I want to impress upon the membership of this committee, if I can, is that the things that bring these conditions about are fundamental things. Opposed to this autocratic idea of ownership, opposed to this autocratic, stubborn, fierce, bourbon spirit of these men, determined to maintain their autocratic control of the people and over what they call their propert is simply this fundamental idea that is growing among the people that in large industries of this kind their own protection, their own welfare, makes it necessary that they should have some force to contend with the overpowering forces of the owners of the property; and that has driven them to the only conclusion to which they could be driven, and that is that they must have an organization of some kind so they may treat on somewhat more equal basis with the forces that are opposed to them. And I believe it has come to the point where it is agreed by all honest students of this question that in these large industries, involving the welfare of hundreds of thousands of people, that the working forces of these industries have a right to have some say in the administration of the industry——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MACDONALD. In one moment—that they should have some say in the administration of the industry as to the hours of labor, wages, and grievances which they should have redressed. Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Assuming that capital on one side may properly organize and labor on the other side may properly organize, what does the gentleman think as to the propriety of compulsory arbitration as between those two organized forces, or does the gentleman think they ought to be permitted to fight this thing out in their own way?

Mr. MACDONALD. I think that between organized labor and organized capital engaged in a struggle the interests of the public are, after all, the predominant interests.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That means there should be arbitration?

Mr. MACDONALD (continuing). And that we should have some law, some power, in this country that is above the demands of either of the opposing forces that can bring about a settlement on some basis, and that is the point I want to come to.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. I will yield.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Has the commission which was appointed upon the gentleman's resolution made a report as yet?

Mr. MACDONALD. The committee?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD. It has not.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I thought the gentleman made reference to that committee during his opening remarks, but I was not sure.

Mr. MACDONALD. I may have referred to the hearings and the testimony taken before the committee.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. I will.

Mr. FARR. I am in receipt of a number of resolutions condemning the outrages there and asking for Federal intervention. Has the gentleman any suggestion to make as to how to prevent bloodshed now in Colorado?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes. It is my purpose in discussing this matter to do it with all the earnestness that I have at my command and to call the attention of the membership of this House to the seriousness of this problem which is before us. We are in a position, as the lawmaking body of this country, where we must find some remedy for these conditions.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. The executive part of the Government is not able, under existing laws, to furnish a remedy. Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea for the committee that has been appointed and has the power to investigate the Colorado mine trouble to return there? It seems to me that while they were there there was peace on both sides.

Mr. MACDONALD. I think, in answer to the gentleman's question, that the testimony which has been taken by the committee of this House in Colorado will amply show to the House what the trouble is. To go back and take more testimony would simply be piling up testimony of the same kind. It would not tend to open up any new problem. The problem is there, just the same. The problem is that these men of large wealth who control these interests have taken to arms in the hands of paid mercenaries and are going to keep their domination of these matters by arms; and they have been and are killing men, women, and children, our citizens and our people, in that process. The report of the committee which was sent to Colorado will show that, and the report of the committee sent to Michigan will show the same.

Now, I want, in conclusion, here to bring up this idea for consideration in the minds of the individual Members of this House, that this problem is before you now. It demands your earnest consideration, because the people in no uncertain terms are going to demand that you find a settlement so that these conditions can not continue. I want to say, further, in conclusion, that overhanging all discussions of matters of this kind there is an atmosphere of fear, try to disguise it as we will. Gentlemen have a very strong distaste for discussions of this kind because of one reason, and one reason alone, when you get down to its final essence, and that is the fear, the unholy fear, of these great and powerful interests that are profiting by existing conditions to-day. And I say it will avail us not to be afraid, because the people are not going to permit us to cower in fear before these problems. They must be met, and met honestly. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I favor the bill which the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I am a member, has reported to the House and which is being considered at this time. I favor authorizing the building of two battleships at this time. I favor and would like to vote for three or even four. I hope they may never be needed, but because of possibilities it would be suicidal on our part not to be prepared.

Mr. Chairman, I have faith in the enlisted men of the Navy, and I have faith in the officers of our Navy. They are loyal and true, and I am glad to pay my tribute at this time to their efficiency and to their honest and unselfish service. Mr. Chairman, our flag has never been lowered at sea, and for such a glorious record we are largely indebted to the officers and enlisted men of the American Navy.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 22 minutes remaining.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read into the RECORD a letter I have just received, addressed to me:

BREMERTON, WASH., April 20, 1914.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I have been instructed by Charleston Camp of Spanish War Veterans to "tender through you to the President of the United States of America their services in case of war or other serious difficulty between this country and Mexico."

I am able to assure you that on very short notice I can place a company of good fighting men at the disposal of the War Department.

In case of difficulties between the two countries I do not want to be left behind, having served during the Spanish War as a sergeant of Engineers.

Hoping that you can put us in the field if we are needed, I am,

Most respectfully, yours, in F., L., and T.,

D. C. MATTESON,
Commander of Charleston Camp, No. 8,
United Spanish War Veterans, Bremerton, Wash.

N. B.—I have been mail carrier No. 1 for nearly four years now; you can recall me now.

MATTESON.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I know personally these Spanish-American War veterans who reside in the vicinity of the Puget Sound Naval Station, and I declare on my responsibility as a Member of this House that there are no better fighters, more worthy friends, or more splendid soldiers in the world than the men who compose that Charleston Camp of Spanish-American War Veterans.

They are good, everyday fighters. I have felt the steel of their blades in more than one local combat.

They are worthy friends. I have colabored with them and shared in well-earned victories over a common enemy.

They are splendid soldiers. Their records show it. Their hearts are right. They are ready again to fight in defense of American ideals.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the chairman of the committee, Mr. PADGETT.

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-one minutes are yielded by the gentleman from California to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to ask your careful consideration to the debate on this question. It has been in many respects a very unique one. Statements have been made that I regret have been made. Charges and insinuations and inuendos of bad faith and bad purpose have been made against the administration and the officers of the Navy.

I wish at the outset to say that there is not one particle of basis for criticism of the Department of the Navy. I said in my opening remarks that the Secretary of the Navy had given his personal attention to the administration of his office, and that he had submitted estimates this year $24,000,000 less than the estimates submitted a year ago. These gentlemen who, in their minority report and one of them upon the floor of this House, characterized it as "inexcusable extravagance and criminal waste of the public money," exuberantly praised the Navy Department for its economy and its wise and judicious administration, and yet the present Secretary had submitted estimates $24,000,000 less. And this bill with two battleships is carrying $836,000 less than the law of last year with one battleship, and these same gentlemen charge the present committee and the present administration with "inexcusable extravagance and a criminal waste of the public moneys."

Again, as I stated a moment ago, they say by innuendo and by insinuation, and by the use of such words as "grafters" and similar terms, that the officers of the Navy are disregarding the true interests and welfare of the Navy; that they are forgetful of the high trust imposed upon them and are recommending the construction of ships that are not needed for the purpose of affording an opportunity to the trusts and combinations in this country to sell steel and other articles to the Navy.

I want to say to you gentlemen that there is absolutely no foundation for that charge and insinuation, and it is a slander upon as honorable, as noble, and as patriotic a band of officers as ever dedicated their lives to the service of their country and who are willing to write their own epitaphs in their own blood for their country's honor. [Applause.] I stand here to repel these insinuations, and I propose to show you before I finish that there is more misstatement comprised in the printed speeches and uttered upon this floor than was ever before embraced in the same length of time or in the same printed space upon any other document.

Who are these officers, my friends? Are they not the men that the President of the United States and the Senators and the Representatives have selected as boys from all over the country and sent to Annapolis and had them trained? Were they not taken from our best families? Have they not been trained under the best influences? Have they not been surrounded with the most inspiriting and patriotic environments?

Have we not committed to them the honor of our country? Have we not placed in their hands the flag of our country, the emblem of our sovereignty, and the symbol of our power? We can trust them to go to foreign courts and represent us; we can trust them to deal with diplomatic questions abroad as our representatives; we can trust them to carry the flag of our country, and we can look to them to hold it untarnished, unblemished, and unsullied. In the face of the enemy's guns we are willing to place them and believe that they will cherish and maintain and protect the honor and the good name of the American people. And yet when we come to the little question of how many ships we may have, to the question of what is needed in the way of new construction, their motives are to be questioned, their honor is to be torn down, and they are to be branded as men moved by an unholy purpose and conspirators in an unholy cause. I repudiate it [applause] and bear my testimony to the men who protect our flag. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman will pardon me. I have so many things here that I can not submit to an interruption.

Now, my good friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] paid me the compliment and did me the pleasure of quoting very largely from a speech that I made in this House in 1910, and when he had finished, or near the close of his speech, very pathetically he said, "I beseech the gentleman to tell me why he has changed." And some Member upon the floor arose and said, ironically, "Can't you tell us why the chairman has changed?"

Let me say, gentlemen, that the chairman has not changed his purposes and his ideas. In the preparation of this bill I had before me the same general purposes, wisely and judiciously, patriotically and honestly to administer the trust committed to me, bearing in mind the environments by which we were surrounded, the circumstances in which we were placed, and the developments that have taken place, to deal with the honor, the welfare, and the protection of the country, and a wise distribution of the money of the people, that I had in 1910.

Why, in 1910, if you please, the Post Office appropriation was $234,692,370. I voted for that. The Post Office appropriation bill that we passed a few days ago was $313,364,367, an increase of $89,000,000. But I would not have voted for this last one in 1910.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I can not yield. I must go ahead.

Why did I vote for $313,000,000 a few days ago? Because the conditions had changed. We have made additions to the service that made it necessary. A few days ago I voted for a resolution to justify the President of the United States in certain actions relative to the Republic of Mexico. In 1910, under the conditions then existing, I would not have voted for any such resolution. Why the change? The environment and the conditions. Times change, and we change with them. Conditions alter, and we adjust our actions to them, and that I have done.

I have got a lot of big books here, but I am not going to take but a moment or two in making references to them. Here, if you please, is the statement with respect to the Navy in 1908, November 1. At that time Great Britain had built a tonnage of 1,669,005 tons, the United States had 685,426, France had 628,880, and Germany had 524,573 tons built. England was first, the United States was second, France was third, and Germany was fourth.

In 1909 Great Britain had built 1,758,350 tons; the United States, second, had 685,706 tons; Germany, 609,700 tons; France, 602,907 tons. The United States was still second.

In 1910, December 1, Great Britain had built 1,859,168 tons; the United States, 717,702; Germany, 666,035; France, 556,306. The United States was still second.

In 1911 Great Britain had 1,896,149 tons; the United States, 757,711; Germany, 749,699; France, 630,705. The United States was still second.

In 1912 Germany had 837,982 and the United States 773,107 tons built. Germany passed us in 1912, and conditions changed.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I can not yield.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will not the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. PADGETT. No. The other records are here, but I can not take up too much time.

Mr. HENSLEY. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. PADGETT. No; I did not interrupt anybody.

Now, then, gentlemen, what are the facts? These records, these ratings, were made by the United States naval officials. The same ratings were made by every naval authority in the world. England made the same; Germany made the same; France made the same.

Now, then, we come to the present time. The same ratings are made, but what is our present condition? Here is the last statement that is made: Great Britain at the present time has completed 2,072,711 tons; Germany has 943,338 tons; the United States, 760,002 tons; France, 645,891 tons. That is, built. How would it be if you took in what is building? How would it be when the present program is completed? Great Britain will have 2,611,291 tons; Germany, 1,228,208; the United States, 921,844; France, 876,155.

Those same ratings, those same figures, are made by the naval authorities of all the world. They are not questioned. They are not disputed.

Now, then, they say that we do not compare the navies in a fair way. Let me call attention to the comparison; and right here I want to pay my respects to those gentlemen who have come before the House and have referred to the Navy Yearbook and have criticized it for leaving out things. The effect of their arguments was to leave the impression on the minds of the membership of this House that the Navy Department officials were improperly withholding information and "juggling the figures," as they said. After they have made all of these insinuations I call your attention to the fact that this book is not published by the Navy Department. It is a Senate document. It is compiled by the clerk of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate. And yet I want to say to you, gentlemen, that every statement in that book, as far as I have been able to find, is absolutely true, and the criticisms that are made upon it are without basis, as I will show you a little later on when I come to deal with these specific matters.

Gentlemen came before you and said that the Navy Department had violated the law in building ships larger than authorized. We appropriated so much money to them, and said to them, "Build a ship and make the armor as thick and the armament as heavy within the limits of this cost as any ship of its kind." These gentlemen say that we did not have a ship of that kind in our Navy at that time, and therefore they had no right to go beyond what we had, although the navies of other countries were building ships of that kind. At the very time they complain of, when the Pennsylvania and No. 39 were planned, in accordance with this appropriation, Japan had laid down and was building the Fuso, a ship of 30,000 tons, and Germany was putting upon her ships armor of 13½ inches thickness, and yet gentlemen complain that we put 13½-inch armor upon ours. The department is to be commended and congratulated that it could get so large and good a ship for the money that we appropriated. [Applause.]

Now, I want to call your attention to another matter. They speak of the broadside fire of the guns and they speak about the weight of metal. Now, what is the broadside fire of our guns in weight of metal? That of the United States battleships and dreadnaughts combined is 175,780 pounds and that of the German battleships and dreadnaughts combined is 176,732 pounds, a slight difference in favor of Germany in weight. But let us come to the energy in foot-tons. The energy in foot-tons of the United States is 8,507,548 foot-tons and that of Germany 11,209,657 foot-tons, or 11 to 8. What does that difference in muzzle energy mean? I do not know of any better illustration than to compare the old muskets that we used in the Civil War with the rifles that are being used in our Army at the present time.

The rifle of 1861 was .58 caliber, the weight of the bullet was 480 grains, and the weight of the charge was 60 grains of powder. The danger space was 100 yards, the muzzle velocity was 800 feet a second, and the extreme range was 2,100 yards.

The modern rifle is .30 caliber; the bullet weighs 160 grains, or just one-third the weight of the old Minié ball; the weight of the powder is 48 to 50 grains; the danger space is 587 yards; muzzle velocity, 2,700 feet to the second; extreme range, 6,160 yards.

When we take the German ships, with their muzzle energy of 11 to 8, there is no comparison in the destructive force.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman mean that the German efficiency is greater than that of the United States in muzzle energy?

Mr. PADGETT. As shown by the figures which I have just read, it is 11,000,000 foot-tons as compared to 8,000,000 foot-tons.

The statement was made here yesterday by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] in criticizing this author that he had left out ten 14-inch guns, and that he had left out so many 12-inch guns, and he says why was it? He says if there had been only one instance it might be an oversight; but he says that we have sixty-four 14-inch guns, while they give a less number of 54 guns. Now, gentlemen, what are the facts? He turned to the page that gives the ships that have or ought to have 14-inch guns upon them. Of those six ships only two have been completed, and only two have guns upon them. They are the New York and the Texas, and they were completed and went into commission after this book was printed. Now, the other four, the Oklahoma, the Nevada, the Pennsylvania, and No. 39 have not yet been completed. The keel of No. 39 was laid since the 1st day of January, after this book was printed.

Instead of having 64 guns, as a matter of fact we have only 46 completed. We have 80 authorized. Some of the number are in course of construction. The others have not yet been begun.

Then he says armament of battleships and armored cruisers of the great naval powers—the United States, 14-inch guns, total 54. But what does it say? It says built and building. The others have not been built. We have 46 that are built, but as a matter of fact we have 80 authorized.

Now, let us come again. He said that they report three hundred and twenty 12-inch guns, and that we have a much larger number than that. I do not remember the number he gave. It is not necessary. He said, "Why do they leave out those?" and intimates it is to mislead.

Gentlemen, what are the facts? Why did he not read it all? Here is the statement right on the page that he referred to: "Armament on battleships and armored cruisers of the great naval powers." He says, "12-inch guns, United States, built, 148." Where are the others? They are on the monitors and the armored cruisers. This book does not purport to give on this page those on the armored cruisers and monitors. They are given on other pages. And yet gentlemen would impugn the veracity and destroy the character and undermine the faith and confidence of the American people in our officers of the Navy upon so slim an investigation that upon its very face shows that the insinuation is false. [Applause.] Why did he not read the caption on the very page of the book showing that the statement is limited to battleships and armored cruisers? Yet the gentleman calls your attention, in the minority report and in his speech, time and again to the monitors and cruisers that have these 12-inch guns upon them. Yet he tries to make this House believe that these men have misrepresented things.

Now, gentlemen, let us go to another matter. I want to call your attention to a very remarkable statement. The gentleman from Mississippi had been discussing the old Oregon, a battleship deserving of honor and fame in her day. But what does he say? He says:

But in point of weight of the metal in a broadside, in point of the muzzle energy, in point of protection by their armor, in point of the destructive force of the gun, there is not a battleship in the German line that is nearly equal to the Oregon. [Applause.] The truth of the business is, if the Oregon was in a battle with any six German battleships, it would destroy every one of them before they would get close enough for their guns to penetrate its armor. [Applause.]

That is the most remarkable statement that I have ever seen put upon a printed page. Now what is the fact? The old Oregon is a small battleship of about 10,000 tons displacement, and has on it four 13-inch guns, 35 calibers—that is, the length 35 times the diameter. The present length of our 12-inch guns is 50 calibers. At 9,000 yards the penetration of the guns of the Oregon would be 8.1 inches. The penetration of our modern 12-inch guns at 9,000 yards is 16.4 inches, or more than double.

Another matter to which I wish to call your attention right here is the fact that I wrote Admiral Dewey a letter, and submitted to him six questions. I said to him first: What is the military value and fighting efficiency of the U. S. S. Oregon, Indiana, and Massachusetts? They are the same class of ships and built near the same time. I shall not read all of his reply, but he says:

The empirical military value of the Oregon, Indiana, and Massachusetts, as compared with the Delaware as the standard of 100, is 13.13. Their actual military value against a line of battle composed of dreadnaughts is nil.

I want to put this statement of Admiral Dewey alongside the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi in his speech:

My own opinion is that they have all three passed their limit of usefulness, and are obsolete in guns, construction, and speed, and that they should be stricken from the list, as their military value does not compensate for the loss to the fleet that would be entailed by their manning and maintenance.

And yet the gentleman from Mississippi comes here and makes the statement that they could destroy any six battleships in the German Navy.

The Admiral goes on with the statement. He puts the Oregon at 13.13 per cent of value compared with the standard of 100 of the Delaware. The Kaiser, the German ship, is 13.60. That is the lowest in the German Navy, and the Oregon, Indiana, and Massachusetts are the lowest in our Navy. Then the list runs up and shows the utter uselessness of the Oregon.

Now, let me call your attention to another matter. The Oregon, Indiana, and Massachusetts were originally built as coast-defense vessels. They had armor of 150 feet along the center, and the armor was constructed to come 3 feet above the water line. Preceding the troubles of the Spanish War it was planned to change the Oregon, Indiana, and Massachusetts and make them seagoing battleships. In making the change they added to the weight so that the battleship tips down in its draft until to-day, with a load upon it, its armor plate is 4½ inches below the water line. Every inch of the Oregon above the water line is exposed in shooting at it, without armor. The armor is all below the water line when loaded.

Another thing, it has unbalanced turrets. It has four big guns in the turret, and if you turn the four guns on the same side in order to fire a broadside, it lists or heels to that side 7 degrees. So that it puts the armor belt still lower and turns the exposed part of the ship as a target for the enemy to shoot it, and yet they tell us that it is a ship that can destroy any six battleships in the German Navy.

Then the bow or front of the ship and the stern or hind end of the ship has thin armor protection for something like 75 feet. I have a letter from Admiral Watt, Chief Constructor, stating that if a shell were fired into either end of it, and let the water in to flood the ends, that the ship would sink.

Now then, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to another matter with reference to our Navy. I want to say that this is not a criticism of construction; it is simply evidence of the process of development that has been made in the construction of ships. At the time our ships were built they were as fine as the world afforded. But here is the fact. Take the Alabama, the Illinois, the Indiana, the Kearsarge, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Oregon, and Wisconsin—eight ships have each four 13-inch guns, and those guns only have a penetration of 8.1 inches into armor at a range of 9,000 yards, whereas the modern 12-inch guns have a penetration of 16.4 inches at the same distance. Would not an admiral or a Secretary of the Navy be subject to impeachment and removal who would send these ships, with men upon them, with human souls, against the modern guns?

Take, if you please, the Iowa, which has four 12-inch 35-caliber guns at 9,000 yards, and their penetration is 7.2 inches as against 16.4 inches for the modern 12-inch gun.

Take, if you please, the Georgia, the Maine, the Missouri, the Nebraska, the New Jersey, the Ohio, the Rhode Island, and the Virginia—eight more, in all. They have each four 12-inch 40-caliber guns that are inferior to the later guns.

Now, I submitted a question to Admiral Dewey, and I said:

In case of a war with a naval power, would the battleships of either of said classes—

Those are the ones that I have just read—be placed in the first line of battle; and if not, why not?

Admiral Dewey said:

In case of war with a naval power none of the ships discussed in questions 1 and 2 would be placed in the first line of battle. Their speeds would hamper the fleet's movement, their guns lack range and penetration, and would be useless at battle ranges of ships armed with modern high-power guns.

Their construction is inferior in kind and distribution of armor and interior construction. To place them in line of battle against modern ships armed with modern guns would be to put them up to be sunk at ranges where their own guns would not reach and would not penetrate, and if they did it would be a useless sacrifice of the ships, with the lives of all the people on board.

To quote the Secretary of the Navy in the hearings before the committee:

I think a Secretary of the Navy who would send them into a line of battle should be impeached.

And then he adds:

And any admiral who would do so, except in the case of the utmost desperation, should be court-martialed and deprived of his commission.

I have a letter from Admiral Fiske, another distinguished admiral of the Navy, in which he said these questions had been submitted to him and had been studied by him, and that he indorsed and made this his own statement. Yet the opponents come before us and make these statements about the efficiency of the Oregon and these other ships. There are 17 of our battleships that are in this condition. I make these statements not in criticism of them when they were constructed, but because the development and progress of naval construction has gone beyond them.

Let me illustrate to you now what I mean. I call your attention to the fact that on a standard of 100 the Oregon stands 13.13, and the New York and the Texas represent 157.65. Think of a comparison between battleships where one represents a percentage of 13 and the other a percentage of 157 of military value and efficiency.

Mr. Chairman, I pass on now to another matter. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] spoke about the battle cruisers. We have not any battle cruisers in our Navy. What is a battle cruiser? It is simply a battleship of 27,000 or 28,000 tons, with 11 and 12 inch guns upon it. The gentleman said derisively that they are made to run, that they are not made to fight, that they are little thin things without any protection. I submitted this question to Admiral Dewey. I wrote to him, "Are the battle cruisers such as are built and building in the German Navy classed as fighting ships in the first line of battle?" He answered, "Yes." These battleship cruisers are ships of 27,000, 28,000, or 29,000 tons displacement. They have upon them guns of 11 and 12 inch caliber, the modern improved guns.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] said they are little thin things without protection. What is the fact? The first ones that were built had 7 inches of armor, the next ones that were built had 8½ inches of armor, and the last ones that were authorized and are now building have 11 inches of armor. Let me call your attention to the fact that the United States battleship Idaho has only 12 inches of armor, and the Michigan and South Carolina, about which you have heard so much, and about which I will talk in a few minutes, have only 11 inches of armor. Many others have only 11 inches. These ships, to which I called attention a while ago, that go into the second line of battle, have only 9 inches of armor. Yet the gentleman could not find language adequate to express his appreciation and his admiration of the fighting qualities of these battleships with 9 inches of armor, notwithstanding the fact that these German battleship cruisers have 8½ and 11 inches of armor and have better and newer guns. But he says they are simply made to run away and not to fight.

I desire now to call attention to another statement. It will be remembered that he made great to do about the fact that we had left out 10 monitors and 14 armored cruisers. I want to say that in not a single publication has any ship been omitted that has been authorized by Congress since 1883. The report of the committee, the publications of the Navy Department, and this book, the Yearbook, that he attempted to criticize, all contain every ship that is in the American Navy, and they all give the date of its authorization and its launching and its completion, its armor and armament.

The Indiana, Oregon, and Massachusetts are not classed among the available fighting ships, and the gentleman says that there is a great wrong done in not classing these three ships among the available fighting ships and that there is no justification or reason for it. He tried to burlesque it and to ridicule it and to insinuate that the Navy Department left out these three battleships without any cause or excuse. Why did he not tell you that the same rule that left out these three ships in our fighting list left out from the German list two battleships just as good—the Worth and Brandenburg. He comes here and calls attention to the fact that we have 10 monitors, and he says that they have been left out; that they are not counted in the fighting force. No; they are not worth a copper for first-line fighting. I asked Admiral Dewey about that, and I will read what he said. The gentleman says they ought to be counted. If you count them, why did he not tell you to count the 8 coast-defense battleships of the Oden class in the German Navy that are coast harbor-defense vessels, just the same as our monitors? He does not tell you anything about that. He criticizes everything, and yet every one of those ships is set out—name, date, armor, and armament—and everything specified, but they are not classed among our available fighting ships. I asked Admiral Dewey a question about that. I wrote to him, "Are any of the armored cruisers or protected cruisers or monitors of the American Navy classed as fighting ships of the first line of battle, or would they be placed in the first line of battle; and if not, why not?" His answer was, "No; they are lacking in all of the characteristics of ships intended to lie in the first line of battle, having neither powers of offense nor defense as against first-line ships. These cruisers will have their own place in war; but to place them in the first line of battle is to uselessly sacrifice them and their personnel without adding any strength to the line. For the monitors, I see no place of any kind in the active fleet at any time. They may be made of some use in harbor-defense work in war; but to attach them to the active fleet or line of battle, with their low speeds, unstable platforms, general poor seaworthiness, poor maneuvering qualities, and weak gun power, would be suicidal." Yet the gentleman comes here criticizing the committee and the administration and the Secretary of the Navy because we decline to state that such ships as that should go into the first line of battle and because they set them out on other pages of the Yearbook either in the second line of battle or for coast defense.

Admiral Dewey submits this statement: The grand total for the United States, total percentage, comparison of their fighting ships, is 18.61, and the grand total for Germany, including the ones building and built and the two lately authorized, is 26.35, so that it is a statement, if you please, of 26 in favor of Germany and 18 in favor of the United States.

My friend, Mr. HENSLEY, read a portion of my speech that I made in 1910. Let me read it:

> The Reichstag a few years ago fixed by law a definite program authorizing the construction of 16 battleships between 1907 and 1917. Up to the present time, of those 16 she has 8 building that constitute a part of her 30, so that in 1917, if she builds the other 8, she will have 38 battleships, and if we only build 1 a year from now until 1917, added to the 33 we have got, we will have 40 first-class battleships as against her 38.

What are the facts? I said conditions change and vary. At the present time, counting her battleships and dreadnaughts, beiause they are simply different types of the same thing, and the battle cruisers and the Worth and the Brandenburg that have been eliminated from the fighting line, she has 48 to-day. What has the United States, including, if you please, the three that have been eliminated and they have been complaining about? We have 39——

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I can not yield. I told the gentleman I was going on with my speech.

Mr. HENSLEY. In the face of the fact——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. PADGETT. As it is, I shall not begin to finish, as I have so many things to take up. Now, then, gentlemen, another matter. They speak about the guns upon the ships, and Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi asked Mr. WITHERSPOON a question with reference to those old 13-inch guns:

> Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is there any reason why they could not put these new guns they claim are better than the old ones on the old ships?
> Mr. WITHERSPOON. None in the world. I was going to discuss that if I had the time. The very fact that they do not do that shows, to my mind, that they are not working to increase the efficiency of the Navy. They are working to squander the public funds.

Now, gentlemen, I asked Admiral Strauss, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, in reference to this matter, and he said:

> On page 7411, in answer to a question by Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, inquiring, "Is there any reason why they could not put these new guns they claim are better than the old ones on the old ships?" Mr. WITHERSPOON replies, "None in the world."
> As a matter of fact, such a substitution could be made only at a tremendous cost, and the final result would not be a ship that could be utilized in battle.
> The Indiana, Massachusetts, and Oregon were appropriated for in 1890 as "seagoing, coast-line battleships," and in consequence of this wording the designs omitted certain qualities, the most important one of which is freeboard. Since that time various alterations and additions made with an attempt to keep these vessels abreast of the times have further decreased this freeboard, so that to-day, when these ships proceed to sea fully loaded with coal, stores, and provisions, the top of the armor belt is 4½ inches below the level of the sea, a fatal defect only to be met by reducing the coal supply; and this, together with their greatly inferior speed (15 knots), renders it impossible for these vessels to keep up with more modern ships or to proceed with them to a common destination.
> On the Oregon the distance between the water line and the bottom of the 13-inch gun port at deep load is a little over 12 feet. This distance on the predreadnaughts is 22 feet, and on the Texas, our latest ship, it varies between 36 feet 7 inches for the highest and 22 feet 9 inches for the lowest. Modern battleships are constructed with high freeboard in order that they may be able to fight the enemy no matter where encountered; and a fleet that is not prevented from fighting by the state of the sea has a distinct advantage. The Oregon could not conduct an engagement in any but a fairly smooth sea without having her turrets flooded.

Now, gentlemen, why was it, when the question was asked by the gentleman upon the floor of the House if there was any reason why you could not substitute modern guns upon a ship of this kind, that it became necessary to impugn the motives and discredit the honor and integrity of our officials? Why could not they get a legitimate and proper answer? Ah, gentlemen, it has been with me all my lifetime, and I am proud of it, never to impute to any man an improper or dishonorable motive or purpose as long as his conduct is susceptible of an honorable interpretation. [Applause.] And that old maxim—I may not quote it in French style—"Honi soit qui mal y pense" [applause] bears upon a criticism of this kind—"Shame be it to him who evil thinks." Now, then, another thing right here in that same connection. I want to call attention, if you please, to another statement in the speech of the gentleman, on page 7407. He says:

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I want to compare these navies. In our Navy we have 39 battleships, we have 15 armored cruisers, we have 10 monitors, making 64 armored ships in all. Germany has 20 battleships, 13 dreadnaughts, and the same—well, the same number of battleships, 39; and then she has 16 cruisers, making 55 armored ships that Germany has. In other words, we have 9 more armored ships than Germany. Do not understand me to say that that proves that our Navy is superior to Germany's navy. It does not prove anything of the kind.

Then, on page 7410, he says:

Now, I want to show you how they do. You take the Naval Yearbook and you will find that in order to compare a part of our Navy with the entire German Navy the two navies are divided up into three classes—first, battleships; second, dreadnaughts; third, cruisers. Then they give, on page 832, a list of the German battleships, German dreadnaughts, and the German cruisers, and on the other page, 833, they give a list of ours. There they stand side by side. The way they have done that is that they leave out 17 of our armored ships. They leave out 3 of our battleships, they leave out 4 of our armored cruisers, and they leave out all 10 of the monitors—17 armored ships do not appear in the comparison at all.

As I stated to you a moment ago, on page 832 is a statement of the battleships, the dreadnaughts, and the cruisers.

On page 833 there appears the statement of the battleships, the dreadnaughts built and building, and the armored cruisers. Now, then, that is all that either one of those statements proposed to give. On other pages are given the other ships. These pages to which I refer state only these classes of ships. But he claimed they left out four, but in his speech he corrected that and made it three. He says:

The Charleston, the Milwaukee, and the St. Louis are classed as protected cruisers.

And he argues that the Navy Department is attempting to practice a great fraud upon us. Now, right here there are the armored cruisers and there are the protected cruisers, one following the other right along, and the only difference is that the total of the armored cruisers is given, and then following immediately, on same page, the three protected cruisers. Now what? These protected cruisers were authorized as such; they were named as such in the law, and in the classification it was entirely proper that they should be classified as they were authorized, designated, and named in the law. The others were authorized, designated, and named as armored cruisers, and they are so designated, and they are put right there together. Now, he insinuates they wanted to practice a deception upon the Government; but right there in that very line what does it say? There is a notation which says:

Officially the three ships are protected cruisers.
They are actually armored cruisers, and they are so treated by standard foreign publications. If included in the above table, they would give a grand total of 14 armored cruisers of 178,395 tons.

And that is within a half inch of the space where the statement of the armored cruisers and the cruisers is given; and in order that there might be no misunderstanding, that there might be no misinterpretation, that nothing might be hid or held back, the author put that note there showing that they were the same in effect, but that the law had designated them by different names. And yet the opponents intimate deception upon the officers of the Navy.

Gentlemen, let me ask you in all seriousness and earnestness, would you as honorable men, who esteem your own integrity of purpose and honesty of thought, attribute improper and dishonorable motives and purposes to other men that stand honorably in the country upon any such presentation of the case as that? [Applause.]

Now, then, another thing. The question was asked Mr. WITHERSPOON about the 13-inch guns. We have 32 of them on 8 battleships; their muzzle velocity is 2,000 foot-seconds; and the 9.4-inch guns in the German Navy have 2,625 foot-seconds. But Mr. WITHERSPOON said they only put 185 pounds of powder in the 13-inch guns, and if they would put a full charge of powder in the 13-inch guns that they would have as much muzzle energy as the others. And he intimated that they were putting a reduced charge in there in order to discredit the guns. Now, what are the facts, gentlemen? I have the letters here, the official documents. These 13-inch guns were built at the time we were using the old brown powder, and the gun was made for the use of this brown powder. But when we changed from brown powder to smokeless powder, which has so much more energy and power, it was found that you could not put in these guns more than 185 pounds of the smokeless powder unless you ran the risk of bursting the gun. Now, is it not just as easy to explain a matter along fair and just lines as it is to impute bad motives to good men? These are the facts. And yet, gentlemen, the opponents come here and say that the Navy is trying to practice concealment and is juggling with figures and dealing with misrepresentation. Let me repeat again, gentlemen, that in my experience of nine years of service upon this committee, having numbers and numbers of officers before us, I have never yet seen one instance or one suspicion of an instance where any naval officer ever appeared before our committee and gave any intimation whatever of a desire or purpose either to suppress the truth or to suggest a falsehood. [Applause.] They have dealt with the committee with the utmost frankness and the fullest freedom of expressing absolutely the truth as they saw it and believed it.

Now, then, there were some questions asked on the floor here the other day about the hearings before the committee, and it was stated that in the hearings there were certain things that were kept out. Yes; certainly there are. Do you suppose that it would be proper for us to publish to the world everything—the secrets of the Navy, or the Army, or of the State Department? Would we tell how much powder we have on hand and its exact character; how many torpedoes we have on hand, and their size and shape and quality, and all of these things? The committee gets such information, but we say to them that these are executive matters.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. PADGETT. I have declined to yield to gentlemen all along, and I must treat everybody alike. I have not time to yield.

But, gentlemen, everything that takes place in the committee is brought here before the House and the public, except those executive confidential matters which relate to a solemn public policy of the country.

Now, gentlemen, I want to say another thing for our committee that can not be said for every committee of this House. Some have one policy and some another, but we have always adopted a policy that just as soon as we have our hearings we publish them and make them available to the world. They are open to the world the very moment the published document reaches our committee room. Some of the committees do not make them public until the bill is presented to the House. We put our bill upon the calendar on the 28th day of last February, and we had made the hearings that were taken before that time public, and they were available to everybody who wanted to get them.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the South Carolina and the Michigan. A great deal has been said by the gentlemen in reference to these two ships. I want to say that every publication that is made by the Navy Department gives those two ships, gives their date, their construction, their size, the armor that is upon them, and the armament. Just a question of classification. These ships are low-speed ships. They are about 16,000-ton ships. Every ship that is in the German Navy that is classed as a dreadnaught is at least 18,000 tons. I believe the smallest one is 18,600 tons. They run up to the building of 29,000 tons for battleship cruisers. The South Carolina and the Michigan are 16,000-ton ships. They have a speed of 18.79 and 18.86 knots per hour. The slowest speed of any of the German dreadnaughts is 20 knots. Now, the department saw fit, in its judgment, to class the South Carolina and the Michigan in the first line of battle, classed as battleships.

The gentlemen of the minority complain that they are not named as dreadnaughts, but for the sake of this argument I will call them dreadnaughts. Then what is the status? We have 7 dreadnaughts, and the South Carolina and the Michigan will make 10 that are built, and we have 4 building at this time. But the New York has just gone into commission. We have 12 dreadnaughts built and building, and, counting the South Carolina and the Michigan, we have 14 first-class fighting ships built and building. Germany has 13 dreadnaughts built and 6 building, making 19. She has 4 of those large battle cruisers built and 3 building, making 26 first-class, high-powered, big-gun battleships. Give them, if you please, the full advantage of the inclusion of the South Carolina and the Michigan in the dreadnaught class and the comparison stands 14 in the Navy of the United States and 26 in the German Navy.

Now, then, gentlemen, in 1910 I stated that our Navy as it then existed was superior to the German Navy as it then existed. I say so now. It was a fact that our Navy as it existed at that time was superior to the German Navy, and every authority so placed it, and not until 1912 did the authorities place the German Navy, built, as stronger than the Navy of the United States, built.

Is it not a little singular, gentlemen, that every naval authority in the world, I care not who they are or where they come from—German, English, French, Austro-Hungarian—agrees with the Navy Department of the United States and places the same estimate of the relative value and standing of the German Navy and the Navy of the United States absolutely as the Navy Department here places them, and only these gentlemen disagree who have signed this minority report, who argue here by the hour on the floor of this House and consume pages in their minority report to overturn the unanimous opinion of all the naval experts and all the naval authorities in the world?

Now, then, in order to do that they come and impugn and impeach the motives and the purposes of our own authorities. Suppose I were to concede and to grant that there was an improper purpose and an improper motive on the part of our own officers to depreciate and belittle our own Navy and its standing. Where is the purpose or the motive on the part of the naval authorities and experts of England and Germany and France and Austro-Hungary to do the same thing? Is it not a little singular that all the naval experts and authorities of the whole world would be false, and that among them all there could not be found one honest man to tell the truth?

Gentlemen, the more you think of these things the more preposterous it becomes, and the more it is to be regretted that men will so forget themselves in their exuberant enthusiasm for their preconceived notions and ideas as to tear down the character and destroy the confidence of the American people in the integrity and high character and standing of the very men in whose hands we place the flag of our country, the emblem of our sovereignty, the symbol of our honor, the sign of our greatness and our power. This very day and the recent days of the past week, while men were standing upon this floor impeaching the integrity and impugning the motives and seeking to undermine—thank God, they can not do it—the confidence of our people in the naval officers of this country, those very officers had been sent by the President of the United States as the trusted, honored servants and agents of our people with the flag of the country in their hands and floating at the mastheads of the ships, commissioned to maintain the honor and the integrity of our country. I thank you, gentlemen. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ANSBERRY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14034, the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 253. Joint resolution reappropriating certain funds for expenditure at the naval station at New Orleans, La.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3403. An act to abolish the office of receiver of public moneys at Springfield, Mo., and for other purposes.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of House joint resolution 241, for the appointment of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, was changed from the Private Calendar to the House Calendar.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14034, the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, general debate having been exhausted, I will ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY, MISCELLANEOUS.

The Secretary of the Navy shall send to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session a complete schedule or list showing the amount of money of all pay under the provisions of this act and for all allowances for each grade of officers in the Navy, including retired officers, and for all officers included in this act and for all enlisted men so included.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. This provision, I believe, was carried in the current law?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how they construe it. Of course this appropriation bill does not provide for the expenditure of money until the 1st of July.

Mr. PADGETT. Not until the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. Do they make returns for the fiscal year or for the time between July 1 and September 1?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand the returns are made for the fiscal year at the beginning of each session of Congress in December, covering the fiscal year preceding, which ended the 30th of June.

Mr. MANN. Of course that is not the way the law reads.

Mr. PADGETT. That is my understanding of it, but I have not looked into it carefully.

Mr. MANN. The paragraph says:

Showing the amount of money of all pay under the provisions of this act.

Mr. PADGETT. This is for the fiscal year. The act begins on the 1st of July and ends on the 30th of June following.

Mr. MANN. This says:

The Secretary of the Navy shall send to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session—

And so forth. The next regular session begins in December, and this paragraph requires a report to be made then under this act.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I see the point of the gentleman now. I think they make the report in the regular Book of Estimates, which is submitted at the beginning of a session.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better to be accurate and strike out the words "under the provisions of this act" and require the report to be made at each regular session of Congress as to the items enumerated, regardless of the provisions of this act? I suppose what you want in December is the expenditures under the current law for the fiscal year which ends June 30.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I think the suggestion of the gentleman would improve it, to strike out, beginning with the word "under," in line 1, page 2, and including the word "and," in line 2.

Mr. MANN. You do not want to strike out the word "and."

Mr. PADGETT. Strike out—

Under the provisions of this act.

Mr. MANN. Yes. Strike out—

Under the provisions of this act.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman offer the motion, or shall I?

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman offer it.

Mr. PADGETT. I move to strike out, in lines 1 and 2, page 2, the words "under the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out "under the provisions of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I listened to the speech made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], the chairman of this committee, and I was considerably surprised to hear him declare that the members signing the minority report had branded the other members of the Naval Affairs Committee, as well as naval officers, as being grafters. I want to say here and now, Mr. Chairman, that I do not believe the chairman of this committee believed that statement when he uttered it. No man who has heard the speeches made heretofore in this House by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON]—the speech upon the flag, the speech upon the naval appropriation bill in the last Congress, or any speech made by myself—can, as it occurs to me, afford to stand upon the floor of this House and declare that we referred to members of the Naval Affairs Committee or officers of the Navy as being grafters. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and I say to the Members of this House, in all seriousness that I do not know of any specific instances of graft on the part of men in the Navy Department; but if I were in possession of facts that would warrant me in stating it upon the floor of this House, by the eternal I think I have the courage to do so; and I say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not set any class of men upon a pedestal to worship. I do not propose to deify any set of men. But let us get at the facts. Whatever construction our report may bear, how does that explain the change in the attitude of the gentleman from Tennessee? Let us look at some of the statements made by the chairman of this committee when the Democrats were in the minority on the floor here. Of course, as he stated in his speech a few moments ago, conditions have changed with respect to his environment. There is no sort of question about that; and when I undertook to inquire of him concerning that proposition, he refused to yield.

In his former speech in 1910 he compared the Navy of the United States with the Navy of Germany, and carried the comparison forward to 1917. He took the program laid down by Germany, and said on March 31, 1910, that if we should authorize one battleship then and one battleship in each Congress thereafter, in 1917 we would have a Navy superior to that of Germany. Yet when I desired to inquire of him in what, if any, particular that program had been changed on the part of Germany, he refused to yield. We want the facts so that we may act intelligently upon the subject. Why did he not explain to this House whether or not Germany had made a change in her program?

Of course, I say, Mr. Chairman, conditions have changed. As he said, his environment has changed. As long as I remain on the Naval Affairs Committee, I say to you and to this House, I am going to do my duty as I see it.

A Republican made a speech a few days ago upon the floor of this House and presented some facts to which I desire to call your attention. I refer you to the speech made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON]. He explained to you the many influences brought to bear by the great concerns of this country to bring about extensions and increases. He took up the Navy League and went over the personnel, and explained their connections with some of the great supply companies, the great corporations of this country. He not only did that, but he took a specific instance here and read the record to show where the Carnegie concern was fined $500,000. And that was after committees of the Navy Department had made an examination, and had inquired into all the facts, pronounced everything regular, and declared the contract with this particular concern in every way to be all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENSLEY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENSLEY. Now, let me read you just a little from this speech of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON]. I desire to congratulate the gentleman from Nebraska upon having the courage and manhood to stand upon the floor of this House and present facts such as his speech contains. I warn him, however, that he may expect criticism from these interests effected. He said:

In Pearson's Magazine of November, 1913, it states:

"The next time the Government wanted armor plate the price from the plant for which it had already paid rose to $646 a ton, and continued at or near these figures until an odd event brought it down. Some workman in the employ of the philanthropist, meaning Mr. Carnegie, made known the fact that the Carnegie Co. was swindling the Government it had already gouged. It was furnishing to that Government fraudulent armor—armor so badly made, so soft and spongy in spots, that if a shell ever hit one of these spots it would slip through like a knife cutting cheese."

At this charge a chorus of most indignant denials filled the air. Would a company composed of our very best citizens and pillars of society and commerce stoop to such detestable things? No, indeed. But the persistent slanders persisted, nevertheless, and low demagogues in Congress and elsewhere made an unseemly clamor, whereupon the Navy Department, just to show how baseless were these stories, ordered reports from the naval officers stationed as inspectors at the various armor-plate mills. These usually found the stories about defective armor to be baseless. But even this distinguished body failed to silence calumniators of true philanthropy——

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. What year was that?

Mr. BARTON. I have not the date at hand. Therefore investigation was undertaken by a competent commission, which found that the charges were perfectly true. On 11 counts the committee found the Carnegie Co. guilty of repeatedly swindling the Government by palming off worthless armor for good.

It found, for instance, that worthless plate had been accepted, paid for, and placed on war vessels as follows:

"On the Amphitrite, 4 plates; on the Terror, 3 plates; on the Oregon, 3 plates; on the Monterey, 3 plates; on the Monadnock, 6 plates; on the New York, 8 plates; on the Olympic, 3 plates; on the Indiana, 6 plates; on the Massachusetts, 4 plates."

When the truth could be no longer concealed Mr. Carnegie's company was hauled up and fined $500,000 for fraud. Then the same subtle and tremendous power that has so often appeared in these matters was exerted, and President Cleveland, a short time before he went out of office, reduced the fine to $120,000.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman give me the page of the RECORD from which he is reading?

Mr. HENSLEY. Page 7021. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is an important proposition. What have the Members signing the minority report in this instance to gain by a fight of this kind? Do we get the purring and patting upon the back? Do we get the encouragement that others do? No. We are criticized, we are abused. What is the inducement, if it is not the simple fact, that we are trying to do our duty as Members of this Congress in the interest of the great body of citizens upon whom rests the burden of taxation.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Why not read the Secretary's statement?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will not have time in five minutes to read the Secretary's statement. I have made no charges of graft against the Secretary of the Navy. I think the Secretary of the Navy should be commended for his efforts to reduce expenses in that department. But I can not agree with him, and have told him that I can not agree with him, upon certain recommendations which he has made; but my difference with the Secretary is an honest difference. I do not question his motives.

But let us go back and talk about these young men. They are appointed to Annapolis at an early age, and it costs the Government of the United States something like $18,000 or more to give them four years' schooling. What do we find? When a class is graduated from this great school these young men go out and take their places. In the past, when special ability has been recognized in any of these young men, frequently we find the great armor-plate concerns offered them such salaries that many of these young men did not care to decline the offers. They get a young man to resign from the service and he enters their employment. Throughout life we find such a relationship existing between men in charge of these great supply companies and men who are the trusted agents of this Nation. That condition should not exist, and you gentlemen know it. Let us be candid about it. [Applause.] Let us be candid about this proposition.

I say again, as long as I stay upon this committee I am going to do my duty as I see it, and in spite of all the disparaging things said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] who has just taken his seat, I will continue to do so. What did he say in that great speech delivered in 1910? I say to every Member of this House, go and read that speech. You will find it in the RECORD of March 31, 1910. Read it in its entirety and see what it means. Get the whole sense of it. Here is one of his statements:

I desire here and now, in behalf of the American people, as far as I am able to speak for them, and in my own behalf as a Member of Congress, to enter a solemn and vigorous protest against the spirit that would seek to impugn and destroy a nation's confidence in order to further naval hysteria in this country.

The statements made by the gentleman from Tennessee in that speech were as severe as any statements that have been made in the course of this debate. Yet he would undertake to say now that we have indiscriminately branded everybody as rascals and grafters. I say that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] knew when he uttered that statement that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] never meant anything of the sort, nor will the language bear that sort of construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of some of the spirit manifested in this debate, I am constrained to define my attitude and state of mind toward the members of this committee. I wish to express my confidence in respect for and good will toward all the members of the committee, especially the 17 members who have signed the majority report. I am impressed that they are all honest, loyal, patriotic, conscientious men, actuated only from the highest motives. I am impressed that they actually believe what they are contending for. I am impressed that these 17 men actually believe that the whole enlightened world, all the great nations of Europe, are lying in wait only for this Nation to lag in naval construction when they will invade our shores, level to the ground our cities, destroy our institutions, and obliterate the very evidences of our civilization.

While this does not appeal to me as well founded, I am convinced that these men actually believe it. They are honest. I am impressed that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] actually believes all he is contending for.

I am impressed that he actually believes that the best way to destroy militarism is to build more battleships, and build on and on until we exhaust the resources of the world, and then, and not until then, will come peace and end the wars. While I regard this as ridiculous, I am convinced that he actually believes it. I am impressed that he actually believes that our industrial system is based on military supremacy; that there is not enough room in this world for all, and that men must fight, kill, and destroy each other for a chance to labor and live. While this is monstrous and absurd to me, I am convinced that the gentleman from Alabama is honest and actually believes this is the solution of our industrial problems.

I am impressed that he has actually believed during all these years he has been warning the country against Japan that the Japs were coming, that he has been looking out over the seas to discern the mastheads of the ships appear on the horizon, and that he still believes they will come, and an opportunity will yet be afforded for brave men to die in the glories of war, human carnage, and mortal combat.

I am convinced that these men actually believe all this. I want to give them due credit for honesty. It has been said that honesty covers a multitude of sins, and I hope that it does. [Applause.]

And I especially want to express my respect, confidence, and admiration for our worthy chairman, Mr. PADGETT. I have only been a member of this committee for a few months, but during that time I have been impressed that he is a most able, learned, and lovable man. He has been so kind and so courteous and so considerate that it is hard for me to realize that I differ with him upon any matter. I am willing to follow him to the ends of the earth except upon one proposition. [Laughter.] We have to-day not only the most powerful Navy in all our history, but the completion of the Panama Canal will more than double our naval power, as was claimed for its construction. We are at peace with all the naval powers of the world. The nations have created a high court of arbitration, which is sitting at The Hague for the settlement of international disputes to prevent war. The nations are everywhere joining with us in peace pacts to avert war. The civilization of the world is awakening and revolting against the awful horrors and atrocities of war. Society is everywhere organizing to preserve peace and to prevent war. There is a stronger sentiment for peace and there are greater precautions and safeguards to prevent war than ever before. England, the greatest naval power in the world, is pleading with the nations to stop the vain and useless building of the warship as a policy to obviate war. Our example before the world is vital in this great international movement and may turn the balance either to or from war. Among the great civilized and enlightened nations of the world the signs of the times point more unerringly than ever before to the triumph of judicial settlement over war.

I can not follow him and ignore all this, disregard all this, resist all this, turn a deaf ear to all this, stand blind before all this—defying civilization, God, and man—to increase our navies and armies greater and faster than ever before in all our history.

The taxpayers of the world are groaning under the pressing burdens of war debts. The navies of the world are all building up together, without change of relative position or gain of advantage one over another. The increase of one navy is only a signal for a like increase of every other navy, and is without other effect than to increase the burdens upon the people of all nations. I can not follow him in a still further increase of our Navy and in piling still higher the burden of war taxes upon the people. It is more than useless extravagance; it is more than criminal waste. It is an unjustifiable encroachment upon the tax-paying masses of the whole civilized world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express personally and as a member of the committee and a Member of this House my great pleasure and gratification that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] made the disclaimer which he did a moment ago. This House is not ignorant of what has been said. In the minority views this language appears on page 48:

> We regard the amount as inexcusably extravagant and a criminal waste of the public funds.

And then, further down on the same page, it uses this language:

> The Navy Department did seek at first to increase at the present session of Congress this criminal waste of the public funds more than $7,000,000; but after the committee had spent months investigating the matter and after the facts had been fully developed and the danger of a failure to secure the authorization of two more battleships had become apparent, then the department reduced its estimates about $8,000,000, and for this reason the bill now carries $836,309.92 less than the last appropriation bill.

I presume that these gentlemen understood the meaning of the English language and of words, and that when they said "inexcusable extravagance" and "criminal waste" they knew what those words meant. I believe three of them are lawyers, and that they knew the meaning of the word "criminal." And then, in the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] he repeated this language, and reaffirmed it after I had called attention to it in my opening remarks, and then, later on, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] relative to replacing old guns with new in the old ships, he said that there was no reason in the world why they could not be replaced except that it would not afford any profit in making guns at the gun factory. And in another place he used the word "graft," and imputed motives of criminal waste and a desire to secure battleships, and I thought it was necessary upon this floor to call attention to the fact that the men of the Navy were honorable men, and that in all my experience I had never seen any evidence or heard any intimation of anything improper on their part.

I am glad the gentlemen of the minority feel the same way. We have now made it unanimous. We can all agree that the recommendations of the department and of all the officers of the Navy are made in good faith as honorable men and pass judgment upon it as a question of wisdom or unwisdom, and of the necessity for it, without imputing any improper motives to anyone.

I want to say further, that I entertain for all the gentlemen who signed the minority report the highest esteem, and nothing but confidence in their integrity and honesty of purpose; but I do think—and I have expressed it—that they were wide of the mark in the correct understanding of what the true naval situation is.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For commissions and interest; transportation of funds; exchange; mileage to officers while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers while traveling abroad under orders, and for traveling expenses of civilian employees, and for actual and necessary traveling expenses of midshipmen while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as midshipmen; for actual traveling expenses of female nurses; actual expenses of officers while on shore patrol duty; for rent of buildings and offices not in navy yards, including the rental of offices in the District of Columbia; expenses of courts-martial, prisoners and prisons, and courts of inquiry, boards of inspection, examining boards, with clerks' and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; stationery and recording; religious books; expenses of purchasing paymasters' offices of the various cities, including clerks, furniture, fuel, stationery, and incidental expenses; newspapers and periodicals for the naval service; all advertising for the Navy Department and its bureaus (except advertising for recruits for the Bureau of Navigation); copying; care of library, including the purchase of books, photographs, prints, manuscripts, and periodicals; ferriage; tolls; costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; reports; professional investigation; cost of special instruction at home and abroad, including maintenance of students and attachés; information from abroad, and the collection and classification thereof; all charges pertaining to the Navy Department and its bureaus for ice for the cooling of drinking water on shore (except at naval hospitals), telephone rentals and tolls, telegrams, cablegrams, and postage, foreign and domestic, and post-office box rentals; and other necessary and incidental expenses: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and purchasing pay offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, shall not exceed $280,000; in all, $1,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I believe the language in line 14, page 2, providing for actual expenses of officers while on shore patrol is new to this bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, it is new language, but it is not a new expense. It is put in the bill in order to make it explicit, so that it would not be a matter of interpretation. That has been paid out of this fund heretofore, and the amount last year was $169, all told.

Mr. STAFFORD. And there is not much prospect of its increasing very rapidly?

Mr. PADGETT. I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought possibly it was some new idea of naval officers to have some entertainment on shore.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all. It is to pay the patrolmen who go ashore when shore leave is granted to men while abroad in foreign cities. It is a kind of police force. The whole amount of it last year was $169.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. I notice in the last part of the paragraph, in the proviso, there is reference made to "clerical, inspection, and messenger service in the navy yards." May I ask how the amount of $280,000 is intended to be expended?

Mr. PADGETT. Just as it has always been—to pay clerical, inspection, and messenger service, and so forth. That has been carried for years that way in the bill.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. How does the amount compare with the appropriations of previous years?

Mr. PADGETT. It is just the same.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Then it is not meant for the messenger service and clerical forces of every sort?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no; but just for this purpose in this bureau.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. So that this would not be the proper place to discuss the suggested wage increase which has been recommended?

Mr. PADGETT. I should think not.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss at any length the main features of the bill that is before the House, but the presence of the specter of war leads me to believe that at this present time we should consider that which to my mind will be one of the most valuable assets to this country in time of war, namely, the Panama Canal. It seems to me that we are now confronted with the proposition of whether or not the Panama Canal is to be used by the United States as its waterway for its warships or whether it is simply to be a convenient passageway for an enemy's ships to go from one of our coasts to the other in order that they may attack that other coast. I recognize the fact that the nation which now threatens war with us does not possess such a navy as to constitute a menace, but history shows that the time when one country is at war with another is often seized upon by an unfriendly third power to bring to an issue those questions which have been pending between them, and it is not beyond the range of possibilities that one or more of the naval powers may seize this present opportunity to present demands concerning grave controversies which are pending between them and the United States. So I say it seems to me that the status of the Panama Canal is at this moment an exceedingly important question, and I desire to devote a few moments to a serious discussion of what should be done, not next year—not some time in the future—but now, as to that canal.

It will be remembered when this question was pending in the House I urged that this House should in some way express its opinion as to the construction of that treaty or at least that it should not let the plain repeal embodied in the Sims bill go without some saving clause to show that we were not waiving our rights under that treaty. Therefore at that time I introduced what is known as House resolution 457, which, after reciting the fact that Great Britain had protested against our exemption clause and our desire to negotiate concerning it, contained the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives of the United States that the enactment by it of the said Sims bill, and the repeal by it of the said clause granting such exemption, are in furtherance of the desire of the United States to facilitate such negotiations between said two Governments, and are in no sense to be construed as waiving or denying any right possessed by the United States to grant exemption from tolls to her vessels of war and commerce.

Mr. Chairman, I made my decision upon the toll question from a consideration of this principle of international law, which is found in the third volume of the American Journal of International Law, at page 55.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia appealed to me for time under general debate. I regretted very much that I could not yield it to him. I now ask unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes additional time, and I will state that I will have no other similar request to make.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. The principle to which I refer is as follows:

If, for example, it should appear that it would have been unreasonable, if not inconceivable, for a contracting state to agree to any but a particular signification of certain terms employed, the necessary inference that such state had acted reasonably, if not wisely, will prevail, although such a signification may be at variance with the literal sense of the words of the compact.

Mr. Chairman, as I say, a consideration of that principle is what brought me to the conclusion that the United States could never have been foolish enough to have intended to agree in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that we would virtually deprive ourselves in time of war of the use of our own canal. We are entitled to the inference before quoted, that we "acted reasonably." Again, I was absolutely opposed to an unqualified repeal of a solemn law that had been passed by the Congress of the United States, because that unqualified repeal, under the principles of international law, must be taken, when any question comes up in the future respecting it, as admitting that we were wrong when we granted that exemption in the first place. And in that regard, Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote further from the same authority on international law, page 52:

Declarations made by the negotiators of a treaty at the time of exchange of ratification, or subsequent thereto, concerning the sense in which it was understood that certain terms were employed are of value as sources of interpretation and should not be disregarded.

As the sense which contracting states have attached to the terms of their agreement is controlling in the estimation of those to whom are intrusted the duty of interpreting treaties, as all circumstances probative of that fact are admissible for the purpose of its establishment, the formation of rules of interpretation can hardly serve a useful purpose.

And on that same question I desire to also cite Vattel's Law of Nations, page 227, an authority dating back to 1793. The first authority that I have cited was a recent authority.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question is, What are we going to do before it is too late? I am not taking the position that we should now say that we have the right or have not the right to exempt our coastwise ships, but I am taking the position that there is no justification for voluntarily surrendering without negotiation the rights we do have under the treaty. There is no man anywhere who can logically contend that we have not the right to exempt our ships from tolls unless he claims that we come under clause 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which says, "The Canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and if he says we come under that clause then he must admit it applies in time of war as well as in time of peace, because those rules expressly refer to belligerents, and belligerents do not exist without war. Now, I want to know whether the Congress of the United States, confronted as we are with war to-day, is ready to say that our ships of war come within these rules of the treaty, which I now quote:

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force,

And so forth.

No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal,

And so forth.

And further:

The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is no reply to this argument to say that in time of war we will sweep away this treaty and disregard the terms of it. You can not claim under a treaty and at the same time nullify a treaty. If this treaty means anything, it means that we are obliged to obey it in time of war as well as in time of peace, and we can not say we will observe it as long as it suits us, but when the critical time comes we will disregard it. And therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, that while we still have the opportunity, while we can do so without giving offense to any nation, while this question is still pending in the Senate of the United States, this House ought to adopt a resolution of this kind, or a similar resolution, so that in the event that this war does become a greater danger to the United States than it now appears to be, and other nations become involved in it, we ought at least to have the use of our own canal for our own ships, we ought at least to exercise sovereignty over our own territory, we should at the least be permitted to prevent our enemy from dedicating this great waterway, constructed by American genius and paid for by American dollars, to the destruction of the Nation that created it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Navy: For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department, or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, $46,000: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of accounts of disbursing officers involved, payments made under the appropriation "Contingent, Navy," to civilian employees appointed by the Navy Department for duty in and serving at naval stations maintained in the island possessions during the fiscal year 1915: Provided further, That the sum of $104,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be expended, on the approval and authority of the Secretary of the Navy, for entertaining the officers and crews of foreign fleets which may be sent to attend and participate in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in consequence of the invitation of the President of the United States, extended in pursuance of the authority contained in the joint resolution of Congress approved February 15, 1911, and of the authority contained in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1911, and for defraying such other expenses incident to the visit of the said foreign fleets as the Secretary of the Navy may deem proper, and the said sum shall be available until November 15, 1915.

Mr. MANN and Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. In the first place, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is intended by the committee to appropriate $104,000?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir. The original amount carried under the contingent of the Navy was $46,000. We make it $150,000 and provide that $104,000.

Mr. MANN. Where is that made $150,000? The gentleman need not look at the bill, because it is not in the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman is right. It ought to be $150,000 where $46,000 appears. That is a misprint, and I shall ask to amend that by making it $150,000.

Mr. MANN. Who made the estimate for $104,000 for entertainment?

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary of the Navy and the department submitted it in the regular estimates through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. It is intended to let the naval officers spend $104,000 in entertainment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; $104,000.

Mr. MANN. What is the expense since wines and champagne have been cut out?

Mr. PADGETT. I am not prepared to speak authoritatively on that specific phase of it at this time.

Mr. GARNER. If they have cut out wines and champagne and other luxuries, you may possibly reduce this appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. This estimate did not contemplate the grape-juice program of the administration?

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PADGETT. I am not prepared——

Mr. MURDOCK. Did the Government on previous occasions appropriate for the purchase of wines?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. That has always come out of the private purse of the officers?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. The officers furnish their own mess and, where they entertain, they furnish their own champagne.

Mr. PADGETT. And pay their own expenses of entertainment.

Mr. MURDOCK. So it would not come out of the $104,000, even if the Secretary of the Navy had not issued the order?

Mr. MANN. Certainly it would; that is what the $104,000 was for to begin with. Since that estimate was made the Secretary has cut out wine in the Navy. Before that the burden of entertaining foreign officers fell upon the American officers.

Mr. MURDOCK. And was not paid out of Government appropriations?

Mr. MANN. And was not paid out of Government appropriations, but paid out of the private funds of the officers.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then my understanding about the matter is it would not come out of the $104,000.

Mr. MANN. That is why this item is provided, because this would authorize the payment of these bills out of this item.

Mr. PADGETT. That is correct. This is intended for the purpose of the entertainment of the foreign navies that come here as guests of the Government upon the invitation of the President under the resolution heretofore adopted by Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any itemized statement of what this expense would consist?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think there is.

Mr. MADDEN. How did they reach the conclusion that it would cost $104,000?

Mr. PADGETT. The statements were that it would take just that amount.

Mr. MADDEN. Somebody ought to know.

Mr. PADGETT. It was sent down just that amount through the estimates.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that when we passed the resolution authorizing the President to invite the foreign navies to meet at Hampton Roads and go around the statement was made that there would be no additional expense to the Government outside of the coaling expense and things of that sort, and that the expenses would be met by the exposition people. Does the gentleman know whether such information was referred to in his committee?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; we have no information of that kind. This is to entertain them when they come here to Hampton Roads to the maneuver grounds preparatory to starting on the trip through the canal, and they come here as the guests of the Government.

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. It is not in the spirit of criticism, but I think it is a rather anomalous statement, it seems to me, for the chairman of the committee to say that you are appropriating $104,000 without the slightest information as to what it is to be used for. They sent in a mere estimate, and you give them the full amount without inquiry as to the purposes for which it is to be used.

Mr. PADGETT. It is for the entertainment, whatever that might consist of, of the fleets of foreign countries that may participate in this exposition and this trip. And if they do not expend that much, the balance will be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. GARNER. I presume, then, upon that theory if they had asked for $640,000, the committee would have given them that much on the theory that if they did not use it they would turn it back into the Treasury?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; I think not; because I think $104,000 for the entertainment of the fleets of all the navies that have been invited—and a number have accepted—would be near this amount; but $640,000 would be entirely extravagant and above the amount that could be expended.

Mr. GARNER. How did the gentleman arrive at the thought that $104,000 would be the amount that would be necessary?

Mr. PADGETT. Because it was stated by the Secretary that the amount was the amount estimated, and because in the exercise of my judgment I thought it was a reasonable amount to be set apart for the entertainment of such a vast number as will be there.

Mr. MURDOCK. About how many foreign crews will be here?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know; but I thought I saw some time ago in the paper that some 15 nations had accepted up to that time.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will it reach 25,000 to 30,000 men?

Mr. PADGETT. I should say much more than that.

Mr. MADDEN. The men will not get that.

Mr. MURDOCK. This is for the entertainment of the men as well as the officers.

Mr. MOORE. Will this entertainment be according to foreign custom or will it be according to the American custom as recently established by regulation?

Mr. PADGETT. As I stated a while ago, I do not know what it would be. I do not know whether the order recently issued by the Secretary relative to intoxicating drinks will be modified for this occasion or maintained. That order was made after the hearings were had and after the bill was reported and was upon the calendar.

Mr. MOORE. Since foreign officers are to be entertained, it is highly probable, if the entertainment is to be creditable to the American Nation, that it should be somewhat after the foreign style and in accordance with the tastes of the foreign officers.

Mr. PADGETT. As to whether they would prefer to be entertained according to foreign style or according to American style as it formerly existed or American style as it now exists is a question of taste that I am not prepared to answer.

Mr. MOORE. The department will determine that later on in spite of the regulation.

Mr. PADGETT. I presume so.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for one moment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. Would $104,000 go far toward entertaining this vast number of officers and crews according to oriental custom?

Mr. PADGETT. I am not prepared to set any measurement as to the amount the Secretary has stated. I have confidence in his judgment and that he has figured it carefully and conscientiously. It is not an extravagant amount.

Mr. FOWLER. You think it will be conducted, then, on an American democratic plan?

Mr. PADGETT. I think so.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he knows whether or not the Turkish Government has accepted our invitation to be present?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not. I thought the gentleman had inquisitiveness enough about him to find that out for himself.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall when the fleets are to meet at Hampton Roads?

Mr. PADGETT. It is to be next February, I think.

Mr. MANN. Then they are to sail down through the canal and out to the Pacific coast?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. And we are to entertain them all the way along?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. There is a convoy that goes; but I think the principal entertainment is to be at Hampton Roads, and then the sailing will be continuous. We pass through the canal, and then there will be, perhaps, an entertainment at the terminus on the Pacific side, but I do not know.

Mr. MANN. The bill evidently contemplates that, because it makes the sum available until November 15, 1915.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir. And you will notice that the other sections also provide for maritime police regulations in Hampton Roads and also on the Pacific side.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I take it from this language, it is to cover the complete cost of the entertainment of all the fleets that assemble here in response to the invitation of the President in honor of the opening of the Panama Canal from the time of their reception until the time they leave San Francisco?

Mr. PADGETT. That is my understanding, and that is the purpose, as I understood it, of the committee and also of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to the expenses at some similar entertainments when we have invited ships in celebration of any event or when they have come here in honor of any event, like the centennial celebration at Philadelphia or some of those other large national celebrations?

Mr. PADGETT. I think we never had anything that in any way has any comparison with or similarity to this entertainment or its magnitude.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recall, but my memory does not serve me very well, that some years ago the President entertained some visitors here in Washington, for which the Government appropriated, if I am not mistaken, about $25,000. I can not recall the precise occasion. Perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee may recollect it.

Mr. PADGETT. Was it in honor of Prince Henry of Prussia?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very likely it was the entertainment for the brother of Emperor William. I see the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] has some reminiscence that he is ready to give us.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. I was one of the commission that laid the cornerstone of the Yorktown Monument, away back more than 20 years ago. I think we were allowed $150,000 with which to entertain the French and Germans and English, and I am quite sure we had a shortage, and we were charged on the floor of the House with extravagance.

Mr. STAFFORD. You entertained them, I assume, in royal style, becoming the occasion?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. We entertained them in good shape. It was a fine occasion and it was done right, I can assure the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. At that time you did have the authorization of Congress for their entertainment?

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Yes; the money was appropriated. But we had a great deal of trouble, as I remember, because it was not long after the Franco-Prussian War, and we found it was very hard to mix the French and the Dutch. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the House that I have information to the effect that something like 85 foreign ships have tentatively accepted the invitation to be present on that occasion, and it is expected that more than 100 ships will be at Hampton Roads at that time, somewhere near the 20th of February, and will proceed, after their entertainment here, to the Panama Canal, arriving there about the 1st of March.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Knowing that the gentleman from California takes a great interest in the Panama-Pacific Exposition, can he inform the House whether the exposition authorities have provided any fund for the entertainment of these representatives of foreign countries?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I have no doubt but that they have provided a fund for their entertainment at San Francisco.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not give us any definite information? It is just a surmise on his part?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I have no definite information, but I have no question in my own mind but that they have.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that it would be perfectly proper for us to provide some sum of money for the entertainment of these foreign guests, if they are guests. We pass a resolution here every few days, and probably will continue to do so, inviting people, with a provision that we shall not be at any expense caused by the invitation. [Laughter.] Now, I think we ought to know more about it. There is plenty of time to get the information and make the appropriation before next February. Apparently no one knows anything about it at the present time. They have not figured it out yet.

We have an entirely different situation in the Navy now, so far as the expense of entertainment is concerned, from what it was when this estimate was made, and I make a point of order against the proviso, beginning on line 8 of page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the tolls that have been or may be prescribed by the President, in pursuance of the authority contained in the Panama Canal act, approved August 24, 1912, to be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal shall not be assessed against nor collected from any foreign vessel which may pass through the Panama Canal en route to or in returning from the Panama-Pacific International Exposition: Provided, That such vessel has been sent by its Government to attend and participate in the said exposition in consequence of the invitation of the President of the United States, extended in pursuance of the authority contained in the joint resolution of Congress approved February 15, 1911, and of the authority contained in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1911.

Mr. WITHERSPOON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois. I was going to move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I am going to make a point of order on the paragraph unless somebody will point out why this is not a palpable violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. PADGETT. This provision puts them all on an equality.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does this extend to the nations not "observing these rules" under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. PADGETT. Those that do not come will not pass through the canal. Those that come will all be passed through on an equality.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I contend that this would be a direct violation of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. If a vessel passes through the canal for a particular purpose it is provided here it shall not pay tolls. If it passes through for another purpose it must pay tolls. For instance, if a vessel comes from Europe, bound to the west coast of America, to Alaska, for example, it shall not pay tolls, but other vessels shall pay. Here is a provision saying that vessels bound from Hampton Roads to San Francisco shall not pay tolls.

Mr. PADGETT. It puts all nations on an equality who go through for this purpose.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not the invitation here extended to all of the nations of the earth? Is it not a general invitation?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it is a general invitation.

Mr. MANN. It would not make any difference whether it was or not, according to my point of view. The question is whether you can say that a war vessel for a particular purpose shall not pay the tolls and another war vessel for another purpose shall pay tolls. That is a plain violation of the treaty.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the exemption is extended to the vessels of all nations on terms of exact equality, to my mind, it would not be a violation of the treaty.

Mr. MANN. It is not extended to all vessels of all nations on an equality at all.

Mr. PADGETT. But it is extended to all vessels of all nations that come under the provision, so that all are treated exactly alike.

Mr. MANN. But you might say, under that, that vessels painted red should pass through the canal free and vessels painted green should not.

Mr. PADGETT. If it extended it to all nations upon an equality, it would not violate the treaty or establish any inequality.

Mr. MANN. I think it would.

Mr. PADGETT. The treaty provides that the Government of the United States will not discriminate against other nations, and shall treat all alike, and this would be treating all alike, even if they were green vessels.

Mr. MANN. Suppose we should say that all vessels bound for San Francisco shall be exempt from the payment of tolls, does the gentleman think that would be in order under the treaty?

Mr. PADGETT. If that was put as a general proposition, and was extended to all nations, there would be no discrimination, but there would be absolute equality.

Mr. MANN. And yet the gentleman and many people claim, with a good deal of justice perhaps, that you can not exempt a vessel bound from New York to San Francisco; but the gentleman says you could exempt all vessels bound to San Francisco.

Mr. PADGETT. No——

Mr. MANN. If you can not do one, you can not do the other.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman has changed his premise. His first one was that all vessels of a certain character, of all nations, could go through, and I said yes. Then in the gentleman's second proposition he limited it to vessels in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I did not say anything about the coastwise trade.

Mr. PADGETT. I know the gentleman did not use those words.

Mr. MANN. I said vessels bound for San Francisco.

Mr. PADGETT. If it was the vessels of all nations——

Mr. MANN. Make it all vessels of all nations bound from New York to San Francisco.

Mr. PADGETT. If they were all treated alike, it would not be a violation of the treaty.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it would, but the gentleman voted that he thought it would.

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this paragraph distinctly discriminates. It provides that the ships of the nations invited to attend the exposition may pass through the canal free. It prevents the merchant ships of our own nation passing through the canal free, although they may want to go to San Francisco. It would prevent the ships of any other nation, except particular war ships, from going through the canal free. If there is any way on earth in which you could discriminate, this paragraph does it.

Mr. PADGETT. It simply permits all ships that come under the invitation and are sent by their governments in response to and in recognition of that invitation, and that puts all of them on an equality.

Mr. MADDEN. When you invite particular ships of particular nations to come to the exposition, you certainly do not invite all ships owned by American citizens flying the American flag doing an oversea business, or our own coastwise ships, to participate in this celebration; and you do not, according to the interpretation of the House, permit those ships to go through the canal free.

Mr. PADGETT. This does not relate to the private ships of any nation.

Mr. MADDEN. If it does not relate to private ships, it must discriminate.

Mr. PADGETT. No; it relates to vessels owned by a government and sent by a government in response to the invitation.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not see any reason on earth why we should do for the Government ships what we do not do for private ships.

Mr. PADGETT. There is a vast difference between inviting a government and entertaining its representaives and entertaining individuals of all the world. There is no similarity between the two.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know that I have the floor.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is not the reasoning of my colleague [Mr. MADDEN] along the line that he would invite a guest to his home to partake of his hospitality and then afterwards charge him for it? We are inviting these ships to come here to participate in this invitation. They are to be our guests. To turn around and charge them for it seems to me a little inconsistent.

Mr. MANN. Is it any more inconsistent than to charge our own vessels?

Mr. MADDEN. There is this difference, that I, in my own house, have no treaty obligations with anybody on earth as to how I shall run the house, and if I invite anybody to my house I can do as I please as to the manner in which I entertain them.

Mr. MURDOCK. Within the law.

Mr. MADDEN. But we have here a treaty obligation that many of us believe we are bound by; and if we are bound by it in one particular case, we are bound by it in every case. There is no way in which you can maintain a law and live up to our obligations under that law except by its enforcement as to everybody alike. That is the contention I make.

Mr. PADGETT. This puts it alike to everybody.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it does not.

Mr. PADGETT. So far as paying our own tolls, we do not have to do that. That would be simply a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. MURDOCK. If this paragraph becomes a law, does the gentleman from Illinois contend that all foreign vessels which make up this parade from Hampton Roads to San Francisco would not pay tolls, but that the American war vessels would?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, not only American war vessels but American merchant vessels that might want to participate in this celebration would have to pay tolls. We are not inviting anybody except foreign nations, and we are only inviting them to come here with their warships. We do not invite their merchant ships. We are discriminating against the foreign nations themselves and their citizens.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman believes that under this provision American war vessels would pay tolls, does he not believe we would pay them back?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe we would have to pay tolls on our warships anyway. I never did believe that. I never believed that there was any sense in the contention that the Government that owned the canal and owned the ships would have to pay tolls on its own ships. I make a distinction between the ships owned by the United States and the ships owned by citizens of the United States engaged in business for profit.

Mr. PADGETT. Ships owned by individuals of any nation, operating for profit, are not included. This relates to Government ships.

Mr. MADDEN. That is a discrimination.

Mr. PADGETT. This relates to Government ships of all nations.

Mr. MADDEN. Then you discriminate.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all. We are not discriminating between any Governments. We are treating all Governments absolutely the same.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Was the point of order made or reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. It was reserved.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I call for the regular order. This discussion is not directed to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph.

Mr. PADGETT. There is no last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All the words have gone out and there is no last word. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HARDY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

April 22, 1914:

H. J. Res. 251. Joint resolution justifying the employment by the President of the armed forces of the United States.

April 24, 1914:

H. R. 10138. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

April 24, 1914:

H. R. 15906. An act providing an appropriation for the relief and transportation of American citizens in Mexico.

April 24, 1914:

S. 4980. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1914.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and empowered to define and establish suitable anchorage grounds in Hampton Roads, Va., and the adjacent waters, for the combined fleets of the United States and foreign Governments which may rendezvous there prior to proceeding to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, to be held at the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., in the year 1915, as well as to define and establish suitable anchorage grounds in the Bay of San Francisco and the approaches and waters adjacent thereto during the continuance of the said Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby further authorized to make such rules and regulations regarding the movements of all vessels in all of the waters named as may be necessary in order to insure the proper and orderly conduct of such features as may be planned for the combined fleets and to provide for the safety of the vessels participating therein; and such rules and regulations when so issued and published shall have the force and effect of law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. My recollection is that the Secretary of Commerce now has the authority that you propose to confer by this paragraph. Heretofore, where such action has been taken by Congress, it has always been taken by giving the authority to the Secretary of Commerce, if there was one, and before that to the Secretary of the Treasury. We passed recently, in this House at least, a general provision authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to establish anchorage grounds and regulations anywhere in the United States. This provision is sure to make a conflict between the two Secretaries. The Revenue-Cutter Service, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, enforces the regulations established by the Secretary of Commerce. Is there any occasion for changing that and giving this power to the Secretary of the Navy, where he might absolutely cut out the commercial vessels in the Bay of San Francisco?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think there is any possibility of that whatever. In reference to Pearl Harbor, Congress several years ago passed a law giving the Secretary of the Navy the right to establish anchorage grounds there.

Mr. MANN. But there is no commerce there, and that is a different proposition. It has heretofore been the policy of the Government to have other departments attend to this matter.

Mr. PADGETT. In this matter we have to entertain the naval fleets of the world, and I think it would be proper for the Secretary of the Navy to have control of it on this occasion and for this purpose.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that there is a great commerce at Hampton Roads and also at San Francisco. Now, the Secretary of Commerce can just as well provide anchorage grounds for the Navy as the Secretary of the Navy can, while, on the other hand, the Secretary of the Navy, influenced by naval officers, in my judgment, is much less likely to take care of the marine interests and much more likely to take care of the selfish interests—and I use the word without any reflection on the naval officers—with reference to anchorage grounds.

Mr. PAYNE. And it might lead to a conflict of authority between the two.

Mr. MANN. It is almost sure to lead to a row.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, well, that is merely a matter of opinion.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Who has control of Hampton Roads now, as far as the anchorage grounds are concerned?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether the Secretary of Commerce has any regulations there or not. The Secretary of Commerce has charge of the harbor of the city of New York, and a few years ago, when they had a great naval parade in New York, the Secretary of Commerce made the regulations and the Revenue-Cutter Service enforced them, and there was no difficulty at all. We passed a bill recently in the House giving the Secretary of Commerce the authority to establish anchorage grounds in any harbor in the United States. I am not sure whether that bill passed the Senate or not.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know myself.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order. I do not think there is any difficulty about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Care of lepers, islands of Guam and Culion naval station, island of Guam: Maintenance and care of lepers, special patients, and for other purposes, including cost of transfer of lepers from Guam to the island of Culion, in the Philippines, and their maintenance, $14,000.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Complaints have been made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] that I and other members of the minority have used language both in the report we made to the House and in our speeches that are not justified by the facts.

The gentleman from Tennessee complains especially that we characterize the expenditure of the public funds provided in this bill as a criminal waste, and also he was especially grieved at the use of the word "grafter" in the speech I made in this House last Saturday.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee and some other members of the majority of this committee are the last ones to complain of harsh language. We have spent four months in very hard labor trying to develop the facts about this Navy and to equip ourselves to show this House the truth about it, and our efforts have aroused these gentlemen to make it exceedingly hot for us in the committee, as they are trying to do here in the House.

In the committee an effort was made to put into the record a number of misstatements of facts which it was claimed that I had made. This debate was opened by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] by trying to convince this House that in a number of particulars which he specified the minority members of this committee had misrepresented the facts of the case. That has been followed up by other speeches. I do not know which is the worse, to charge a man with being a grafter or to charge him with misrepresenting the facts.

In the charges made against us, Mr. Chairman, there was no uncertainty as to the persons referred to, because our names were read out as the persons who had misrepresented the facts.

Now, I have never said that any Member of this House or anybody else was a grafter; but I want to say this, and I want to say it now, that in this bill there is a large amount of graft. And I want it clearly understood that I make no disclaimer for anything I have said heretofore, either in the minority report or in my speeches in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to demonstrate to this House that there is no earthly use for the construction of two more battleships, and I believe that the expenditure of $30,000,000 for useless and unnecessary ships is the worst kind of graft.

Of course gentlemen who think that we need the ships, that they are necessary, would have a different view about it. I expect to show, when we reach the items in the bill, that this bill carries an appropriation for the purchase of four and one-half million pounds of powder, which, under the facts developed at the hearings, we do not need; that the only effect of that waste of the public funds is to fill the coffers of the Powder Trust.

But the gentleman from Tennessee, in his speech in opening this debate, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] on yesterday enumerated the number of articles, among others specially treated steel, which is largely used in the construction of battleships, and they stated as an evidence of economy that the Secretary of the Navy had reduced the price of these articles to such an extent as to reduce the cost of one battleship, or to save in one battleship, about $800,000. I want to give you the facts about that. That is exactly true, so far as it goes, but it does not state all of the truth. The Secretary of the Navy told your committee this. He said that heretofore these articles on which so much has been saved and armor plate have been let out to the lowest bidder on bids that would require the bidders to bid for all of them or none, and that the result of that was the only three concerns in the United States that can construct armor plate are in a trust with foreign corporations, that the terms of that trust are such that the world is divided, as he said, into three parts, just as Cæsar divided Gaul into three parts, to use his own language, under an agreement that these foreign members of the trust will not bid on armor plate and these other articles in America in consideration of the fact that our American trust will not bid for the same articles in foreign countries. He said that when all of these articles were put up in a bid in such a way that no man could bid for one unless he was able to construct them all, it resulted in giving this trust the entire thing, and that they fleeced and robbed the American people to such an extent that when the price was brought down by competition to what it ought to be he claims to be able to save $800,000 on each battleship. But he says that as to armor plate that is impossible, because nobody else can make it except the trusts; that he can not get any bids in foreign countries on armor plate for the reason that the trusts forbid that, and so the Secretary says, "I am helpless; I am powerless; I have to pay their price." He said that the three members of this Armor Plate Trust had been sending in their bids for years on this armor plate, the bids being identical to a cent, and that when he became Secretary of the Navy they sent in bids for the armor plate that we want to purchase now, and that all three of the bids were identical to a cent. He sent for them and charged them with being in a trust. He charged they could not have bid identically the same amount unless it was done by agreement. They acknowledged it, and he rejected the bids and advertised again.

The result was that while we have been paying $454 a ton, when the Secretary rejected their first bid, because they were identical, they came along and bid $440. He saved $14 a ton on the armor plate. He has had a very thorough investigation of the cost of manufacturing armor plate made, and the experts report that we can manufacture our own armor plate for $279 a ton. Yet we are bound to pay this trust $440 for a thing that is worth $279. That is the statement of the Secretary of the Navy. If we authorize these two battleships, we have got to purchase 16,000 tons of this armor plate at the price this trust says we must pay for it, and the Secretary acknowledges that he is helpless. I asked him, "Mr. Secretary, rather than submit to that outrage, rather than submit to having the American people robbed and forced to pay $440 for a thing that would cost only $279, do you not think that we would better postpone the construction of these battleships until we can erect a factory and make our own armor plate?" He said no; that he thought we better submit to it.

Mr. Chairman, that is the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy. I mildly called that graft, but I now call it rascality, oppression, and robbery, and that is what it is. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman speaks of the high charge and then he speaks of the yielding Secretary. Wherein is the graft, in the yielding or in the charge?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Oh, yielding and charging is not grafting. It is building these battleships and submitting to the extortions of this trust that is trying to rob us by making us pay $440 a ton for a thing that is worth $279. It is a mild use of language to call that graft. A Member of the House may advocate it, a Member of the House may vote for it, and I do not say that that makes him a grafter.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Where is the power lodged to change this condition?

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The power is lodged right in this House and can be exercised by striking these two battleships out of this bill. [Applause.] That is the only way you can do it. I started to say that it was not my duty, that it is not my province, nor is it my pleasure to characterize any of my colleagues who may advocate that or who may vote for it; but I do say that you can not vote for these two battleships wihout voting for graft, and then I submit it to your own conscience as to whether a grafter is a man who advocates it and votes for it or a man who merely receives the money. I express no opinion upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gntleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It is impossible for me to say in the limited time under the five-minute rule just what I would like to say. The chairman of this committee, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] has so accurately stated, began when he presented this bill to the House by using language concerning the members who had signed the minority views, which certainly was a challenge. As he expressed himself a few moments ago in reply to what I said, he also must understand the use of language. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has been upon this committee for a number of years, as he has stated to you, and in answering what I said a few moments ago the gentleman read portions of the report which we, who signed the minority views, submitted, and he then quoted from a speech made by the gentleman from Mississippi. He points out certain language contained in the minority views and certain language contained in the speech, and says that the gentleman must have known what this language meant. I say to the gentleman from Tennessee that when he delivered his speech on the 31st of March, 1910, he must have known precisely what he intended to convey to the House when he used the following language:

> Now, my countrymen, I appeal to your patriotism and your sense of fairness. Is it right, is it patriotic, that we should use such a nightmare to stimulate the growth of naval hysteria in this country in order to foster the propaganda that I believe is set afoot and maintained by the beneficiary interests in this country that profit out of the spending of thirty or forty million dollars a year out of the naval program of this country?

To whom did the gentleman refer when he used this language in his speech? What did he mean for Congress to understand when he said this? Did he hope that the men who understand the use of language would understand that he, the gentleman from Tennessee, who also understands the use of language, meant nothing more nor less than grafters? Tell me that the great corporations of this country that profit by these increases were not referred to as specifically by the gentleman from Tennessee as we referred to them.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact the Secretary of the Navy has a real anxiety to change this condition of affairs?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will answer my friend from Massachusetts. In my judgment there is no question about it, but we are in the grasp of that tremendous institution, the Armor Trust concern, and we have been in the grasp of it for many years. As the gentleman from Nebraska stated on the floor of the House only a few days ago, that institution was fined $500,000 for perpetrating fraud upon the American Government, and yet we continued to contract with this same company.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. And has not the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Chairman, recommended the establishment of an armor-plate factory to be owned and operated by the Govment of the United States?

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I can say I make no charge against the Secretary of the Navy——

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Is it not true?

Mr. HENSLEY. I have no doubt in my mind of an honest desire on his part to reduce these expenses. I differ from him when he comes before us and says we need two battleships and that we should further submit to this sort of an outrage. There is an honest difference of opinion on that proposition, but I make no charge against the integrity of the Secretary of the Navy. I entertain no such feeling for or opinion of the Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended. Does the gentleman desire 5 or 10 minutes?

Mr. HENSLEY. Five minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. For five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missour be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will.

Mr. CALLAWAY. What does the gentleman think about the heads of the departments of the Government who come here and advise that we surrender to these combinations and pay them $450 a ton for armor plate that only costs $279 a ton to produce? Is not that advising this Congress that we surrender to the combinations of this country?

Mr. HENSLEY. Well, I would say to my friend from Texas that I can hardly take that position. He may think the needs of the country are such that we should have these additional battleships, and that because of that fact we should submit to this sort of outrage. But I do not believe it is necessary. I said the other day in my speech upon the floor of this House that if the needs of this Government are 10 battleships a year for the national defense, the American people are ready to submit to the tax burden; but if we find they do not require one additional battleship, then why submit to that sort of a proposition?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, when the Mexican Government or Huerta would not salute our flag, we will call every American capable of bearing arms and spend every dollar we have got to maintain our dignity; but when the trusts demand that we surrender our rights and pay them tribute almost twice as much as armor plate is worth to build battleships we get down on our bellies and crawl. We are a lion in the face of Mexico, but sheep to be led to the shambles when confronted by the Steel Trust. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ADAIR. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is going to offer an amendment to this bill providing for an appropriation sufficient for the Government to construct a plant in which it may build its armor plate, or if he himself has taken any step looking to that end?

Mr. HENSLEY. The bill under discussion contains an item looking toward that end.

Mr. ADAIR. Does not the gentleman believe it would be well for this House to take some step to that end, rather than to criticize the administration for asking for battleships which the administration seems to think are needed? Does not the gentleman think it would be better to take some action in that matter?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana we can not do all of these things at once. I have made a careful study of the subject, and I am giving you my views upon it, without any criticism of those who honestly differ from me.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Neither can the Secretary of the Navy do all these things at once.

Mr. ADAIR. The Secretary of the Navy can not do all these things at once.

Mr. HENSLEY. Would the gentleman suggest we exercise no judgment at all with respect to these matters?

Mr. ADAIR. I would suggest if it is necessary to construct these battleships we procure the armor plate to construct them, regardless of where we are compelled to get it.

Mr. HENSLEY. I maintain it is not necessary and there is no occasion for it and that we should construct an armor-plate concern in order to meet the needs of this Government.

Mr. ADAIR. That is a difference of opinion, as a matter of course, between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENSLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is it not a fact that some years ago an appropriation was made for the purpose of constructing an armor-plate plant, and through some influence from some source or other it was never utilized for that purpose? I think there were some $4,000,000 appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes; such an appropriation was made.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It was through influence from somewhere, I do not believe it was exercised here, or anything like that, but from some place or other influence was exercised to stop the Government from protecting itself against these abnormally high prices for armor plate.

Mr. HENSLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit the only sane and sensible reason suggested as to why we should submit to these increases, and this is from the speech made at a meeting of the American Academy of Social and Political Science in the city of Philadelphia, April 4, as follows:

Rear Admiral Richard Wainwright, speaking on the part of American interests in the Pacific, said he believed that some of the misunderstandings in that part of the world were due to untrained diplomats, and made a plea for the better training of such officers. Referring directly to Japan, the admiral said there was "no present reason, no chance, one might also say, of war with Japan." He knew most of the elder statesmen in that country, he said, and felt sure they would never consent to a conflict without justification. "But," added the speaker, "it is folly to be weak when we have the power to be strong."

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] appealed to the House the other day in behalf of the Navy. He declared that the Navy was being criticized, and in glowing language appealed to this Congress to treat it fairly. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us inquire into these matters——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HENSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENSLEY. These boys at Annapolis—and I do not at this time or at any time propose to cast any strictures upon those young fellows—if they are able to avoid the plucking board, are able to pass the examinations, the law promotes them right along until they reach their retirement. In the last Congress I introduced an amendment to the bill to cut out the four years' time these boys are attending school, which costs the Government of the United States something like $18,000, all charges included, for the education and training of each one of them for service in the Navy of the United States, instead of counting this time as services rendered in computing their retirement periods, as was done previous thereto. The chairman of the committee opposed my amendment, when it effected a saving of over $300,000 annually, but by the support of Members on both sides of this Chamber we put the amendment through.

"It is folly for us to be weak when we possess the power to be strong," says the admiral. Yes; we have something like 150 rear admirals on the retired list here in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in this country, drawing something like $1,000,000 a year or more in pensions, as against 25 rear admirals in the active service. The burden is not sufficient. The taxpayers of this Nation can stand it a little further, and therefore "it is folly for us to be weak when we possess the power to be strong." We have increased the appropriations going to this department 400 per cent in the last 15 years. Yet this is not sufficient.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENSLEY. In just a second. We find the rear admirals who are retired on big pay going over the country, at the instance of the Navy League or for other reasons, making speeches and stirring up the people for the purpose of bringing about further increases. And, gentlemen, let me say to you that the same influences that are at work here all the time stirring us up to make extensions and pointing to Japan, Germany, and other countries as probable foes of our country are present in those countries stirring up the people against the United States for the same purpose; that is, to bring about larger appropriations. In Germany only recently they prosecuted and convicted some of the parties engaged in this sort of business. The press has contained dispatches from Tokyo to the effect that the Japanese people were rioting and were ready to mob some of their people who were responsible for increases in the navy.

Mr. HOBSON. I merely wish to ask the gentleman if he intends to vote with us in the committee when we endeavor to try to reorganize the personnel so as to not turn out officers to the retired list, except only at the top of the grade?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman that I will consider the matter very carefully when presented to me and then vote as my best judgment directs.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. CARTER. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says about this extortion being practiced on the United States Government by the Steel Trust, and I want to ask if there is any way on earth that we can prevent the Steel Trust from taking advantage of the United States Government except by refusing to carry out the naval program of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. HENSLEY. As I understand, I will say to my friend from Oklahoma, we can authorize the building of a plant that will enable us to manufacture our own armor plate and prevent this sort of gouging, but you will find in the future, as in the past, that the fellows who are the beneficiaries will crowd around and do everything in their power to prevent this Congress from doing that sort of thing. Let us be candid with ourselves at any rate.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I have not decided just how I shall vote on this two-battleship proposition, but——

Mr. HENSLEY. I have, I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER. It is not difficult for an honest man to decide how he should vote on the armor-plate proposition that the gentleman presents to the House. But does not the gentleman, when he calls upon us to vote against two battleships simply to avoid this extortion, understand that he places us in about the same attitude as a man who might be called upon to fight a duel, and because there is only one gun store in the town, and because that store charges an extravagant price for a gun, he goes out and faces the other fellow's shotgun with bare knuckles?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman that your case is not on all fours at all with this, for the reason we have your man loaded down with armament to such an extent that he can not use that that he already has. [Laughter.] So there is no occasion for going further.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman why it is that the administration, with the Attorney General, does not immediately prosecute this trust? What are they waiting for?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he will have to get an answer from those gentlemen.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No. I will not be able to get an answer. I do not represent the administration. But you have 161 majority here——

Mr. HENSLEY. I did not yield for a speech from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MURRAY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENSLEY. I might retort, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], if I wanted to play politics upon the floor of this House, that for 16 long years your party was in power and at a time when they were authorizing sometimes as many as four battleships a year and why did you not rout these great trusts, as you were in a position to do so all this time?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I asked you that question because you have the trusts in your charge now, and, inasmuch as you have been trying to get at them for the last 16 years, now that you have a chance why do you not do it?

Mr. HENSLEY. I will say to the gentleman that the administration will probably reach the trust question before some people desire it.

Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts. May I ask the attention of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY] to the provision on page 55 of the pending bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy and directing him to investigate and report at the next regular session of Congress upon the selection of a suitable site for the erection of an armor plant to enable the United States to manufacture its own armor plate and special-treatment steel capable of standing all tests required for use in vessels of the Navy?

May I ask the gentleman to direct his attention to that feature of this bill?

Mr. HENSLEY. I shall be glad to. I am very glad my friend has asked the question.

As I understand it, for a number of years past these preliminary steps have not only been taken, but definite sums have been appropriated looking to the erection of an armor-plate factory in order to get ourselves out of the grasp of this institution. If I have not said it so that it could be understood, I say now that I sympathize with the Secretary in his efforts to reduce these expenses, although I have not agreed with him on some of the propositions. I have said it to him, and I shall not dodge it here. I have my views and judgment to direct me, and I do not propose to yield to the suggestions of others when they do not in any sense correspond with my views. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HENSLEY. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. The gentleman has left the impression, with me at least, from the language which he used, that, in his judgment, it would be scarcely possible for the Government to construct an armor-plate plant and manufacture armor plate because of the opposition that would come from the trust. The gentleman does not want to cast that sort of a reflection upon the party in power, does he? We know that the gentleman——

Mr. HENSLEY. Oh, if the gentleman has gotten that idea from what I have said—that I intended to convey that sort of an impression—then I have been very unfortunate, I must say, in the language I have used.

Mr. ADAIR. I do not think the gentleman intended to convey the impression; but, really, the language used by him a few moments ago would convey the impression that the gentleman doubted whether or not the administration could carry out that idea because of the opposition that heretofore had been made and would again be made by the trust.

Mr. HENSLEY. Not in the least, let me say to my friend from Indiana; but beyond doubt the effort will be made by these great concerns to prevent us from taking these steps. He is a business man, as I understand it. He was for some years the head of a banking institution. Would a private institution in this country, however profitable their business might be, enter into a contract wherein the concern would suffer a loss of two or three million dollars on an investment of thirty millions when it could save that amount? Should we do it unless there is pressing need at this time for additional battleships?

Mr. ADAIR. I am in sympathy with many of the remarks the gentleman is making, but I do not believe he wanted the impression to go out that this administration was in the control of a trust and could not break away from it even if it tried to do it.

Mr. HENSLEY. Oh, no. I did not intend that that impression should be conveyed.

Mr. ADAIR. I asked the gentleman the question I propounded in justice to the gentleman himself. I did not think he would like that impression to go out.

Mr. HENSLEY. I thank the gentleman. I love the flag as much as anybody does. I know our history. I know the cost of that flag. It has been purchased by the blood and lives of millions of men who were ready to go on the field of battle and fight for it. It has been sanctified by the tears and the prayers of the mothers throughout the ages, and I am just as slow to give up any rights or liberties which that flag is intended to represent as any man on the floor of this House. But I submit, my friends, in view of conditions, that there is no need of any additional battleships at this time; and for that reason I stand upon this floor and am willing to submit to all the belittling things that may be said about me in the press, by the chairman, or by anybody else, in order to represent my honest convictions upon the proposition. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say very clearly and very distinctly that I have not said at any time anything belittling of the gentleman from Missouri or anyone else. I have stated that I never resort to anything of that kind, and I must disclaim that part of the gentleman's remarks.

I rose for the purpose of calling attention to the statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] relative to the statement about the cost of armor under Government manufacture. The statement of the gentleman, I am sure, was made inadvertently when he said that the Secretary stated that it could be made at $179 a ton in a Government plant. On page 623 of the hearings of the Secretary this statement was made, speaking of the manufacture of armor, and so forth:

> Mr. WITHERSPOON. My recollection is that Admiral Strauss stated that the Navy Department had found out that they could manufacture their own armor plate for $187 a ton.
> The CHAIRMAN. About $280 a ton, varying in price according to the capacity and amount that was made.

Then, turning to the testimony of Admiral Strauss, as it appears on page 531 of the hearings, I read from the tables there that in a factory with a capacity of 20,000 tons a year—manufacturing 20,000 tons—the cost would be $279 a ton; manufacturing 10,000 tons a year the estimated cost would be $349 per ton, and manufacturing 5,000 tons the estimated cost is $400 a ton. In a factory with a capacity of 10,000 tons, manufacturing 10,000 tons, the estimated cost is $314 per ton; manufacturing 5,000 tons the estimated cost is $394 per ton. In a factory with a capacity of 5,000 tons, manufacturing 5,000 tons, the estimated cost is $354 per ton.

I simply wanted to say in addition, however, that these estimates are very largely made without that acute investigation that should be made to authorize the Government to go into an expenditure of a great many million dollars in a class of manufacture that is hazardous; and until we get the detailed information the committee thought that we should authorize and direct the Secretary to investigate and report to the next Congress the cost of a plant, the location of a plant, the cost of the manufacture, and all the detailed information that would be essential to enable the committee and the Congress to reach a clear and intelligent opinion.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. PADGETT. And we have included that in the bill.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COX. Supposing that the Government would build two dreadnaughts, as set forth in your bill here, how many tons of armor plate would the Government require for use in a year?

Mr. PADGETT. About 16,000 tons; about 8,000 tons to a dreadnaught.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. What I was going to say is that it takes from 32 to 36 months to build one of these dreadnaughts, and that expense would be distributed. But assuming that two should be authorized each year, that would be the equivalent of two constructed each year.

Mr. COX. Yes; or 16,000 tons each year.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will yield, what is the estimated cost of a 10,000-ton capacity plant?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I ask that my time be extended five minutes, so that I may answer these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Or what is the estimated cost of a 20,000-ton plant? I understand that would be more practical.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not have the figures in my mind just at this moment, but we have it stated in the hearings.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman remember the cost approximately?

Mr. PADGETT. My recollection offhand is that it is something more than $10,000,000.

Mr. WINGO. For the 20,000-ton plant?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. The figures are set out in detail in the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. On pages 512–516 of the hearings the gentleman will find the total cost stated at $15,327,000.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 516 the total cost of a plant of that kind is estimated at $15,327,000.

Mr. WINGO. Have you anything to indicate what is the probable life of a plant of that type?

Mr. PADGETT. It was estimated that it would have to be renewed at something like 10 per cent a year.

Mr. WINGO. Ten per cent a year depreciation?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; about that sum. As I stated, these figures are not in as minute and accurate detail as we would like to have them.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HENSLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not true that in the price set out in the hearings, Admiral Strauss explained that he had figured in the interest on the investment, overhead charges, and all of those things that any private institution would have to take into account.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that he said he had included all of them. I think he said he had included many of them. I do not think he said all. For instance, I do not think he figured anything for taxes. I do not think he included anything for the salaries of what are known as the administrative officers. I do not think he figured in anything for insurance, because the Government does not insure. That is my recollection. I have not looked it up for some time.

Mr. HENSLEY. Does it not represent a saving of $161 per ton, the difference between $440 a ton and $279 a ton?

Mr. PADGETT. That would be a matter of subtraction.

Mr. HENSLEY. A matter of calculation?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HENSLEY. On two battleships, what will that represent per year?

Mr. PADGETT. I have not made the computation. There is no dispute that if the Government can manufacture armor plate at $279 a ton and has to pay $440 a ton for the purchase of either 8,000 or 16,000 tons a year, there would be a saving. But, as I stated a moment ago, this is a hazardous manufacture. Take a plate that is 20 feet long and 10 feet wide, the size of one of the armor plates, that represents an immense amount of money in the tonnage in the plate at any price. The spoiling of that plate represents a large loss. The Government in experimenting with this thing, in educating and training its men, might lose a very large sum of money; that would add to the cost of the material that was manufactured in perfection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think the Government could employ experts, the same as private manufacturers, to manufacture this armor plate?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If the Government was to manufacture its own armor plate, it would mean no private manufacture of it, and the experts in that line could be employed to do the work for the Government.

Mr. PADGETT. That is true. They could be employed; but my information is that some of the experts in the manufacture of this armor plate are paid at the rate of $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000 a year. The Government does not pay salaries of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. In order to answer this question, I will ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not want to be put in the position of appearing to be opposed to this matter. I am only saying that the committee has instituted a proceeding by which we feel that the Government will get the necessary information for intelligent action upon the matter.

Mr. LEVY. Does the gentleman know what it costs foreign governments for armor plate?

Mr. PADGETT. They pay more than we do, with the exception of one government, I believe.

Mr. BROWNING. Is it not true that these plants that are manufacturing armor plate did so only at the solicitation of the Government, because they were requested to make it for the Government?

Mr. PADGETT. The Government is their only customer, of course.

Mr. BROWNING. They enlarged their plants to make armor plate because the Government wanted them to?

Mr. PADGETT. And I suppose also because they saw a profit in it.

Mr. BROWNING. I presume so. Most people are in business for profit.

Mr. BARTON. And I will say that the Government let contracts enough, with margin enough of profit, to pay for the building of the plants.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know about that. I will state, though, that the records show that we have paid less for armor in this country than any foreign country, with one exception.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. If there be no objection the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

Transportation: For transportation of recruits for the naval service; for travel allowance of enlisted men discharged on account of expiration of enlistment; transportation of enlisted men and apprentice seamen at home and abroad, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation to their homes, if residents of the United States, of enlisted men and apprentice seamen discharged on medical survey, with subsistence and transfer en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of sick or insane enlisted men and apprentice seamen to hospitals, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation, $850,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, line 19, by striking out the words "for transportation of recruits for the naval service"; page 6, line 22, after the word "seamen" and before the word "at," insert the words "and applicants for enlistment."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Those in favor of the amendment will say "aye"; those opposed will say "no." No one voting, the amendment appears to be lost.

Mr. PADGETT. I voted for it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I voted, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear anyone vote for it.

Mr PADGETT. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 3.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making a statement. I stated a moment ago that on page 516 of the hearings it appeared that the cost of a Government armor plant was $15,327,371. I wish to state now that that embraces a gun-forging plant in connection with the armor plant. On page 510, with reference to an armor-plate factory, for a 20,000-ton factory the cost of the establishment would be $11,288,421. For a 10,000-ton factory it would be $8,466,000. For a 5,000-ton factory the cost would be $6,300,000. I wanted to put that correction in because the other estimate that I gave embraced the factory and a gun-forging plant.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I understood the gentleman to say that we paid less for armor plate than any other nation in the world except one.

Mr. PADGETT. That is what the report says.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. What nation manufactures its own armor plate?

Mr. PADGETT. France, I think, is the only European nation that manufactures its armor plate. As to Japan, we have never been able to ascertain whether she manufactures hers or not.

Mr. LEVY. I think we supply Japan with armor plate.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Does the gentleman know what it costs France to manufacture her armor plate?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I do not.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. In regard to the alleged trust to control armor plate, does the gentleman know, or has he had any information as to an international combination on that proposition?

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary of the Navy stated that he was of the opinion that there existed an agreement or understanding among the manufacturers of different nations in which they had parceled out the territory, and that they did not bid against each other.

Mr. MOORE. We might call it a charge, but I do not want to call it by so harsh a term. Still the gentlemen advocating a small Navy have indicated several times that there was an international trust or such a combination, for instance, as to force the maintenance of high prices in armor plate throughout the world. Is there anything in the hearings bearing on that question that would justify that allegation?

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary of the Navy said that it was his opinion that there did exist an agreement or cooperation of some kind by which the manufacturers of Europe would not come into this territory to bid in competition with the manufacturers of this country, and that the manufacturers in this country would not bid in opposition to the European manufacturers in their country.

Mr. MOORE. And, therefore, any relief that the United States might desire as against exorbitant prices would be found in the construction of an independent armor-plate factory?

Mr. PADGETT. That was his statement.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for me to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allude to the advocates of a small Navy. Did the gentleman mean to include me?

Mr. MOORE. I did not mean to include the gentleman invidiously at all.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. That is not what I want to know. Did the gentleman refer to me as an advocate of a small Navy?

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from Mississippi has made two eloquent speeches on the subject which would lead us all to believe that he was in favor of a small Navy, and it is constantly in the newspapers, from which, under this administration, we get a great deal of information, that the gentleman from Mississippi is one of the advocates of what is called a small Navy.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I know my friend from Pennsylvania did not intend to misrepresent me. When the newspapers say that I advocate a small Navy, that is the most conclusive evidence that I advocate a big Navy, because they do not tell the truth about me at any time. [Laughter.] Now the gentleman refers to me and others as advocates of a small Navy. If I have not made myself understood, I would like to say now that I think we have the most powerful Navy on earth, and that I advocate it. I want to improve it, and when you refer to me as advocating a small Navy you put me in an attitude I do not think I ought to be put in.

Mr. MOORE. I wish to say to the gentleman, if the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me——

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman can take the floor in his own time; I have finished.

Mr. MOORE (continuing). That no one in this House, I am sure, having heard the gentleman on more than one occasion would question his patriotism, his desire to maintain the honor of his country, the upholding of the flag concerning which no man has spoken more forcefully than he, but it would appear from the gentleman's persistence in leading a small body of Representatives in this House against the construction of battleships that he was not wholly in sympathy with the majority of the House on either side in the policy of maintaining a Navy sufficient to meet our needs in case of war.

I would not for a moment have the gentleman misunderstand anything I have said, but it does appear that the gentleman has been opposed to the construction of battleships of a size and of an effectiveness, as we understand it from experts, which would place the United States in the third or fourth place among the great powers of the world with respect to the strength of the Navy.

I do not believe the gentleman would like to have the United States so placed. He claims that the United States is strong as it is, and uses the illustration of the battleship Oregon as indicating that battleships of that class are sufficient to meet upon the high seas and successfully defeat battleships of greater power and greater strength. In that he differs from those who have expert knowledge, and particularly the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it in order to move to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been proceeding in his own time.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I understood I was using the time of the gentleman from Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman still has three and a half minutes left.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the Chair. I think I can finish in that time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman fails to understand either the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON], or any of the gentlemen who are in sympathy with his stand for a sufficient Navy; not one of us has ever undertaken to say that the Oregon could defeat ships of superior strength and power. Such a contention would place us in an absurd and ridiculous attitude, and I do not think that the men who are in favor of a moderate but sufficient Navy, are either absurd, or ridiculous. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] essayed to demonstrate, and no one has undertaken to reply to the figures which he presented, that comparing the Oregon with ships of the same age and type in Germany, the Oregon was superior to them, and, therefore, could demolish them. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] imputed to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] the statement that the Oregon could defeat six German dreadnaughts, but that statement was not made on the floor of this House. The gentleman from Mississippi made no such statement.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, surely the gentleman heard the statement made by the chairman of the committee a little while ago, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] undertook in his speech to say that the Oregon could meet and outclass six of the best of the German ships.

Mr. PADGETT. Not the best.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I did not hear any of that statement, but even if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] had made the statement there was no occasion for me to rise and correct it. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Mississippi never compared the Oregon with the German dreadnaughts. The RECORD shows what he did say. He took up the German battleships for the purpose of comparison. These were ships of the age and type of the Oregon, and upon the comparison he very clearly demonstrated that the Oregon was superior to her hypothetical German adversaries. This was all he ever undertook to do.

Mr. MOORE. I think I am entirely accurate in saying that both the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], the chairman of the committee, have said in addresses on the floor of the House——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, the gentleman from Alabama declared the gentleman from Mississippi had stated that the Oregon could defeat six German dreadnaughts. That does appear in the speech of the gentleman from Alabama, but no one can find such a statement in the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MOORE. I surely do not want to misrepresent the gentleman from Mississippi, because I esteem him too highly, as he knows; but it has been said here, and much of the argument has been based on the statement, that the gentleman from Mississippi did state that the Oregon was sufficient in her power to meet and defeat six vessels of the German Navy.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This discussion shows how much time is consumed in combating men of straw that our adversaries erect for the purpose of triumphantly overthrowing them. The statement imputed to the gentleman from Mississippi was never made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee read into the RECORD the statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON]. He did not use the exact language that the gentleman from Pennsylvania attributed to him, and so that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter I will again read what the gentleman from Mississippi said. It is as follows:

> So in point of weight of the metal in a broadside, in point of the muzzle energy, in point of protection by their armor, in point of the destructive forces of the gun, there is not a battleship in the German line that is near equal to the Oregon. [Applause.] The truth of the business is if the Oregon was in a battle with any six German battleships it would destroy every one of them before they would get close enough for their guns to penetrate its armor. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee kindly answer me a question? Is there anything that goes along with the equipment of a fighting ship like the Oregon, as described by the gentleman from Mississippi, that is needed to make a vessel more effective?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; there are many things; but I do not want to take up the time now to discuss them. There is the question of speed, belt armor, and a multitude of things that have been discussed time and again.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. MOORE. I yield.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I would like for my friend from Pennsylvania to understand exactly what I intended to say.

Mr. MOORE. It is very clear now from what the gentleman from Tennessee has read.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I think that my language is accurate, but it seems to be misunderstood by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I would like to just recall what I said in a few sentences. I stated that the German Navy was divided in our Navy Yearbook into three classes—battleships, dreadnaughts, and cruisers; that there were 20 battleships. I used the word "battleships" there to distinguish those 20 battleships from the dreadnaughts. Then I took up the first 5 of those 20 battleships and compared them with the Oregon, and then the second 5 which are a little different from the first 5, and then the last 10 which are different from the others, and compared the 20 battleships with the Oregon as distinguished from dreadnaughts, and my statement there is that the Oregon is more powerful than any one of those battleships. Sometimes the word "battleship" is used in the sense of all battleships, including dreadnaughts, but the connection there shows that I was using it to distinguish that class of ships from dreadnaughts. It seems that I can not say anything in this House that somebody does not misunderstand.

Mr. MOORE. I am very glad the gentleman makes this statement, and I am quite sure I want to understand him and I hope others do, but the difficulty is this: Listening to the gentleman, as I have tried to do, and I am always interested in what he says, and having listened to the interpretations of at least two Members from his own side in regard to what he said, I would say that the lay mind, apart from the expert, the man of technique, would be apt to take the gentleman from Mississippi to mean that the American Navy with a few ships like the Oregon would be fully able to meet any great nation on the high seas. I think the impression left by the gentleman, whether it may be unfortunate or not, is that with a few more Oregons we would have all the navy necessary to meet the navy of Germany, or of Japan, or of Great Britain, which has the strongest navy of all the nations. Therefore I am glad the gentleman has made the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would not have said anything in this discussion had it not been for the reference made by the distinguished chairman of the committee as to the question of the price of armor in America and abroad, and I desire to have his attention, because I probably will want to ask him some questions. I have no fault to find with his statement in any way whatever. As I recall, he made this statement, in substance: That in America we pay less for armor than is paid by any other country in the world except one. Now, if I have not correctly quoted him, I will be glad to have him correct me.

Mr. PADGETT. I think that was the substance of what I said.

Mr. FOWLER. I think his statement is practically true as to present prices, as far as I have been able to ascertain, and I have gone into the question with some degree of care; but I desire to call his attention to this: That prior to 1894 America had been paying enormous prices for armor, all the way from $500 a ton to $725 a ton. During that year the Bethlehem Co. entered into a contract to furnish Russia with a sufficient amount of armor for one battleship at $249 per ton, with a provision to furnish enough for two more battleships if required by Russia at the same price. I now desire to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that that was the beginning of a reduction of the price of armor plate not only in America but in other countries, and if soon thereafter, in order to prevent reasonable prices and at the same time affording reasonable profits, the representatives of the armor-making plants of the world did not meet in Paris and have a tentative agreement, which is sometimes called a "gentleman's agreement," that the plants that made armor and armament and other munitions of war would not compete with each other or send bids to the individual countries where such plants existed? I want to know if it is not a fact that Secretary Herbert, when he came into office as Secretary of the Navy, did not institute an investigation for the purpose of reaching the question of the fraud that had been and was then being perpetrated upon America by those high-price companies?

And did they not practically admit that they were then in a conspiracy against the people of this country to defraud us by extortionate prices, and if through that investigation and the investigations following by the House and the Senate the price of armor was not reduced from $600 and more to the price of $411, and if that was not the fixed price thereafter for some time, and did it not result in a saving to the American people of $24,000,000?

Mr. TAVENNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. TAVENNER. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement of Secretary of the Navy Daniels to the effect that while the Armor Trust was selling armor to Russia at $249 a ton they were at the same time charging the United States $616.14.

Mr. FOWLER. That is true, Mr. Chairman, and that is the very point I am trying to make, that when there was an effort on the part of the American manufacturer of munitions of war to extend our trade into foreign countries it was done at the expense of the foreign manufacturers, and they pretended to do it at the same time——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOWLER. At the same time they were charging the American people $600 a ton in round numbers for the identical character of armor that the Bethlehem Co. was selling to Russia for $249 per ton.

Mr. LEVY. Will my colleague allow me? Did not the United States drive the Bethlehem Co. out of business in manufacturing armor?

Mr. FOWLER. The Bethlehem, like other corporations of this country, was able to take care of itself. And soon thereafter it entered into an agreement with the other two plants that manufactured armor and armament in America, and when the three have submitted prices for American armor and armament it has been for almost identically the same price—to a cent in some instances. In one instance in 1906 their price differed 6 cents a ton, and in another instance 11 cents a ton. And that is how near they were in a trust, and that is how able they were to take care of themselves—Oh, Bethlehem!

Mr. LEVY. I understand that the Bethlehem Co. is out of business, so far as armor plate is concerned.

Mr. FOWLER. But the Bethlehem is not out of business.

Mr. LEVY. Oh, no; as I understand, the company no longer manufactures armor plate.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, but Bethlehem has been in what they call a "gentleman's agreement" in America, and that is to divide the profit no matter who gets the business.

Mr. LEVY. As I understand, the United States first persuaded them to go into the business and then failed to give them very little, if any, business, and it drove them out of competition.

Mr. FOWLER. But at the same time I want to tell the gentleman that the Illinois Steel Co. was not in the deal——

Mr. LEVY. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. FOWLER. And that that company proposed that if the United States would give her the business of furnishing armor for 20 years she would manufacture it and furnish it for $240 a ton. [Applause.]

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. I will.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The gentleman stated the trust was selling to our Government at $616 at the same time it was selling to foreign governments at $249?

Mr. FOWLER. It was the Bethlehem Co. that did that.

Mr. LEVY. And the Russian contract was the cause of the company becoming a competitor in the manufacture of armor plate.

Mr. FOWLER. The Bethlehem Co. has never complained that she did not make a reasonable profit on the 1,500 tons of armor which she furnished to Russia.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I would like to ask the gentleman if, according to his ideas, that would be graft? If not, what would it be?

Mr. FOWLER. With all deference to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON]—and I regard him as one of the ablest men on the floor of this House—I do not know that I have the same idea of graft that he has or that other men have. My definition of graft is a liberal one. [Laughter.] Whenever by force of circumstances there is an agreement to destroy competition for the purpose of increasing the price of the commodity or lowering the quality of the commodity by the makers thereof it is graft. I do not care where it is or who is engaged in it.

Mr. MOORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman believes there is an international trust to manufacture armor plate, does he not?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know of any lawful agency in the United States Government by which such a trust could be prosecuted?

Mr. FOWLER. In the United States?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, I do not know, except in so far as the American end of the game is concerned.

Mr. MOORE. If there is an international trust and some one in the United States participates in that trust, there must be a United States branch of it, subject to the laws of the United States?

Mr. FOWLER. I presume, as I said, that the agents of the three armor-producing plants in America had entered into a secret deal with the armor-producing plants of foreign countries.

Mr. MOORE. A reprehensible and unlawful deal, as the gentleman believes?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; reprehensible and obnoxious in the extreme.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know what agency of the Government is charged to prosecute such an unlawful deal?

Mr. FOWLER. I know the agency through which prosecutions are carried on in America for the violation of Federal statutes.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman know who is in control of the Government of the United States now; who has the power to direct the agency that has the power to prosecute an illegal trust? Can the gentleman tell us who is in control of the administration now?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly. Every schoolboy knows that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Then why does it not act against this illegal trust?

Mr. FOWLER. For 16 long years your party was in power, when this trust grew to its greatest power of oppression. [Applause on the Democratic side.] During that time, in 1900, through the influence of Democratic agitation, a provision was carried on the naval appropriation bill for $4,000,000 to build a United States plant for manufacturing armor and armament in America, and for some reason, unknown to me, and I presume probably to the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. MOORE. No; I disown it. I do not know it——

Mr. FOWLER. That $4,000,000 evaporated like the children of the mist, and we never heard of it any more.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania represents a State where the greatest amount of armor and armament is manufactured, and I have no doubt but what he is exceedingly anxious to throw his strong arm, as a Member of this great body, around those plants to protect them in their business.

Mr. MOORE. If they exist in Pennsylvania and are illegal they ought to be prosecuted, and you have the power.

Mr. FOWLER. Yet I do not think for one moment the gentleman, honest, true, and honorable as he is, would think of protecting them in an unlawful and unwarranted combination against the American people. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. If there was an unlawful trust, say one of the tentacles of the "octopus" in the State of Illinois, which the gentleman represents, would not the gentleman be in favor of having the Attorney General of the United States proceed against that unlawful arm?

Mr. FOWLER. I would furnish the Attorney General all the convicting evidence at my command. Would the gentleman do it in his State? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE. Of course I would. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman has a great big job on his hands, because the evidence is plentiful in his State, as I am advised.

Mr. MOORE. That is your job. You say we had 16 years in which to do it. Did your Attorney General under Grover Cleveland, the last Democratic President, hold the antitrust laws of this country to be effective in cases of this kind?

Mr. FOWLER. He convicted Andrew Carnegie, and a judgment was rendered against him for his unlawful conduct, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is familiar with it.

Mr. MOORE. Why, Andrew Carnegie walks the streets today in safety and sanctity, I will say to the gentleman, preaching peace and supported by the gentleman's administration. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has never attained the arts of Andrew Carnegie. He is always with the administration, regardless of its politics. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. I have learned the art of practicing what Mr. Carnegie preaches, which preaching the administration pretends to practice. When the administration gets to practicing what it preaches, then I may go along with the gentleman on that proposition. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, the administartion has started in, I warn the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and this administration does not intend to look back.

Mr. MOORE. Against the Steel Trust has it started in yet, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. FOWLER. Your party looked back, and has been turned into a pillar of salt. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. When the Attorney General of the gentleman's administration gets busy with the Tobacco Trust and the Steel Trust and other trusts of which the gentlemen on that side of the House complain it will be time to judge.

Now, I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. FOWLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask the gentleman, since he thinks there is an international trust and that it is raising prices against the American Government in the construction of battleships, why in the tariff bill passed by the gentleman's party and signed by President Wilson no longer ago than October last the duties upon the goods manufactured by this international trust were so lowered that the trust prices have continued to go up?

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, they are treated just as other men are.

Mr. MOORE. Yes; but if they were trust products, why were they so treated?

Mr. FOWLER. The Democratic Party is in favor of equality among men, and it tries to practice that; but whenever the Democratic Party finds men guilty of crime it stands for the enforcement of the law; and I warn the gentleman that his State had better take care of its lawbreakers if he expects them to escape Federal prosecution. Our party is not against the lawful use of big capital, but it is opposed to the unlawful combination of such capital for monopoly and in restraint of trade.

Mr. MOORE. We were told that last year and we have been waiting ever since, to the great annoyance of legitimate business.

Mr. FOWLER. That is the familiar cry of the trusts whenever their illegal and unrighteous methods are exposed.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the varied and diverse discussion that has just taken place. I want to read the latest prices paid by naval powers for armor: Japan, turret armor, $490 a ton; Krupp side armor, $490 a ton. Austria, $729 for turret armor, and for Krupp side armor $511. Italy, $444 for turret armor, and for Krupp side armor, $405. Germany, for Krupp side armor, $490. France, for turret armor, $598; Krupp side armor, $460. England, turret armor, $691; Krupp side armor, $503. Russia, turret armor, $510; Krupp side armor, $368. United States, turret armor, $518; Krupp side armor, $454.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman explain why Austria pays so much more than anyone else?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know. Now, I want to read a statement that appears upon page 507 of the hearings, in the statement of Admiral Strauss, of the cost per ton of armor to the Government of the United States, beginning with 1887 and continuing down each year to 1913:

Cost per ton to Government.

1887	$615.24
1890	599.04
1893	657.93
1896	590.12
1898	410.52
1899	410.25
1900	420.00
1903	420.00
1903	398.00
1904	420.00
1905	420.00
1905	398.00
1906	346.00
1907	420.00
1908	420.00

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is Saturday afternoon and past 5 o'clock. Down in the Southland there is a tradition and a practice to suspend a little bit earlier on Saturday afternoon, and I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BORLAND having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SIXTH INTERNATIONAL COMMERCIAL CONGRESS (H. DOC. NO. 928).

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, to be held at Paris from the 8th to the 10th of June, 1914, and a letter from the Department of Commerce showing the favor with which that department views the proposed gathering, and recommending an appropriation of not to exceed $2,000 to defray the expenses of participation by the United States.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1914.

The message, with accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in relation to a question of a privileged resolution and to insert a few letters and telegrams.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. On what subject?

Mr. LEVY. On a question of privileged resolution—a privileged question.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. 7138. An act to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war; and

H. J. Res. 253. Joint resolution reappropriating certain funds for expenditure at the naval station at New Orleans, La.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution authorizing the Vocational Education Commission to employ such stenographic and clerical assistants as may be necessary, etc.; to the Committee on Education.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, April 27, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:
